Bush proposes to remove U.S. combat forces

From Staff and Wire Reports

WASHINGTON — President Bush, acclaiming the "revolution of '89" in Eastern Europe, proposed a sharp new cut in U.S. and Soviet combat troops Wednesday night, saying in his first State of the Union address "the time is right to move forward" in Europe.

The troop offer was the surprising — and popular — centerpiece of a speech in which Bush also proposed lofty goals for American schools and prodded lawmakers to approve his plans for a capital gains tax cut and bills dealing with clean air, child care, crime, drugs, education and other issues.

Seeking to redeem his pledge to be "the education president," Bush set a goal of lifting American students to first place internationally in math and science, two subjects where they traditionally rate poorly.

Several K-State administrators said they were glad to hear educational proposals were included in Bush's address.

"He made some very good points about the Headstart program, and I'm anxious to see how it's going to develop," said Anita Pankake, assistant professor of education. "I'm glad it's high on the agenda."

President Bush said the Headstart program is important to make the children ready for learning before they enter elementary school, and education isn't going to improve by spending more, but by expecting more.

Mike Holen, acting dean of the College of Education, said the Headstart program has been effective, and making sure children are ready to learn makes a difference.

"The president was articulate in stating the goals we've developed over the years," Holen said. "The nationwide program, Youth 2000, has goals of increasing graduation rates, math and science proficiency and curriculums, and President Bush's goals seem to be very consistent with this program."

House Speaker Thomas S. Foley, D-Wash., embraced the troop reduction plan but said Democrats would offer a domestic agenda of their own.

With ambassadors from across the world in attendance, Bush said, "We are in a period of great transition, great hope, yet great uncertainty..."

"The events of the year just ended — the revolution of '89 has been a chain reaction, change so striking that it marks the beginning of a new era in the world's affairs."

Hours before he delivered his address, Bush telephoned Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev to advise him of his proposal to cut U.S. and Soviet forces in Central Europe to 195,000 on each side. In his speech, Bush said:

"We recognize that the Soviet military threat in Europe is diminishing care until it has recovered and can hunt live prey successfully. The bird will be thoroughly examined before it is released.

Project Release helps animals

Creatures encouraged to recover without interference

By Chris McEntee

The Project Release Wildlife Rehabilitation Center is not a zoo or an animal hospital, but a place where injured birds or mammals are left to recover in a natural environment.

Project Release has created a place for injured wild animals to heal and recover without much human interaction after they have been treated and released by the KSU Veterinary Medical Hospital, said Roger Wallace, treasurer of Project Release.

Four great-horned owls, one red-tail hawk and three American kestrels, formerly known as sparrow hawks, are in rehabilitation.

"There are no people out there working with the animals," Wallace said. "The whole purpose of the facility we have right now is to limit human contact so the animals do not come to rely on people."

The contact with the animals is a few minutes a day, said Teresa Bradley, chairwoman of fundraising and public relations for Project Release.

The animals currently in rehabilitation are all adults, Bradley said. In the spring, younger animals are often orphaned because the parent is hit by a car or killed in some other type of accident.

"With the orphans, there is more contact because they need so much more care," Bradley said. "But it has to be done in a way so the animal does not imprint on the person caring for it."

She said it is important the caretaker not become emotionally attached to the animal and vice versa.

"What we are interested in most is the rehabilitation and the release," she said.

The animals are fed once a day and their cages cleaned once a week, Bradley said. Organization members and volunteers do most of the cleaning and building of the facilities.

The locations of the flight cages, which are used to help birds learn to fly again, are kept secret from the public, Wallace said. He said it is important for the animals to have a chance to return to their natural environment as quickly as possible without being bothered by cats, dogs and other animals, including human beings.

The 57 members of Project Release plan to expand the facilities as fast as the funds will allow, to accommodate as many animals as possible, Wallace said. Of all the incoming wild animals, 90 percent are birds, he said.

"The percentage of birds that actually get rehabilitated and released nationally is very low," Bradley said. "We realize we are not going to make a huge change in the numbers that are out there, we just have to educate the people out there to appreciate wildlife more so that we are making a difference."

People who find injured or orphaned wild animals often bring them to the veterinary clinic, Wallace said, but sometimes animals will come from rehabilitators in other areas.

"People will bring animals to the various zoos around the state, and the zoos send them here," he said.

The animals are first evaluated by Dr. James Carpenter and Dr. Karen Munana, exotic wildlife clinicians at the Veterinary Medicine Complex.

Most of the animal injuries that are encountered are broken bones, Wallace said. Some animals also have neurological problems.

"Once we take them out to our flight cage, we wait until they are observed enough so we know they

Wefald responds to library issues

By Tomari Quinn
Staff Reporter

Following a Farrell Library student sit-in and Board of Regents member Charles Hostetler's comments regarding library funding, President Jon Wefald Wednesday issued a news release in response.

In the statement, Wefald said recent attention to funding support for Farrell Library is helpful.

"A vigorous debate regarding the centrality of the library and its appropriate level of funding, including the need for a new addition, is healthy and constructive," Wefald said in the statement.

Wefald said his administration has made the library a top priority.

"We've been talking about these things for weeks, months," he said. "This is a good opportunity to lay it out."

Wefald, according to the news release, said his administration's accomplishments include protection of the library against a $3.5 million budget rescission in November of 1986, $530,370 in additional base funding and $40,000 in one-time allocations since the fall 1987.

His administration has moved the library from ninth to fifth on the University's capital construction priority list, the release said.

"For years most of the Educational Building Fund of $13 or $14 million went into the construction of new buildings, but the past two years it has been spent on maintenance," he said, according to the release.

Even if the EBF were allotted, in entirety, to construction, Wefald stated in the release, it would likely cover only one or two new buildings a year among the regents universities.

"I for one agree we should stick to the maintenance policy," he said. "So many buildings are in disrepair."

Provost James Coffman said maintenance is crucial because many of the institutions, including the University, are falling behind in maintenance — as much as $1 million per year.

Wefald said funding for the library has been inadequate for years.

"It wasn't adequate three, four or 10 years ago," he said. "There hasn't been adequate funding for 30 years."

A study of the library by an outside consultant will allow the University

Hayden: Voters would support tax rollback

By Chris Koger
Government Editor

Gov. Mike Hayden said he thinks a proposed state constitutional amendment rolling back local property taxes and putting a cap on future increases would be passed overwhelmingly by voters.

Hayden, who unveiled his proposed amendment at press conferences in Manhattan and four other cities, Wednesday, said it would give Kansans a historic opportunity to orderly and systematically reduce the state's reliance on property taxes.

With "Kansas Proposition 13," taxpayers' 1991 property taxes would be reduced to 80 percent of their 1989 taxes bill, and future property taxes would rise only proportionately based on the rate of inflation.

Hayden said it would be up to local voters to choose whether to adopt the amendment for their own taxation district. If they do, he promises a 20 percent rollback in all property tax bills.

Overall, $310 million in property taxes would be lost, decreasing the property tax burden from 33 to 28 percent of total taxes.

"They will be rolled back regardless of classification," he said, "whether it is commercial, agricultural or residential — no matter what county — unless, of course, residents of the property tax district decide against it."

To make up for the 20 percent change without affecting the tax base, Hayden said it would be up to local governments to determine where the tax money would come from.

"Obviously, we must provide for an alternative for local governments, by changing the tax mix or relying on other taxes than property taxes," Hayden said, adding that he recommends increases in sales taxes.

Edward Seaton, publisher of The Manhattan Mercury, questioned Hayden about how school districts would be able to combat the drop in tax revenue. Hayden recommended local option sales taxes, but said his proposal would establish a commission that would be able to develop recommendations for the revenue replacements.

The commission would report to the 1991 Legislature, which would serve as a "referee" for school districts, cities, counties and other entities who are dependent on taxes.

"Everyone gets a certain percentage of the tax, and there is going to have to be a mechanism where they can share the pie," he said. "There is going to have to be negotiations within the tax subdivisions."

Hayden's plan relies on a circuit breaker which would give short-term relief for businesses who experience substantial tax increases. Small business owners are particularly apprehensive about the proposition, and are worried about the proposed mix of taxes and its effect on consumers.

Hayden said no two tax districts would be affected alike, which would have an impact on the voters' decisions during the general election Nov. 6.

"I think it's important that we (let the voter decide), because I think the government that is close to the people is the best," he said. "It's important to give people the opportunity to vote on a simple amendment they can

Kuwait offers hostage help

KUWAIT (AP) — A Kuwait newspaper said Iranian leaders believe Westerners held by Shiite Moslem extremists in Lebanon have no more political value and are willing to help secure their release.

A senior Iranian envoy close to President Hashemi Rafsanjani "recently met with an American personality in Geneva and discussed the hostage issue with him," the daily Al-Qabas said in a dispatch Tuesday from Paris.

Rafsanjani and close aides "are convinced the value of the American and Western hostages is decreasing by the day," said the paper, quoting West European sources it did not identify.

"The hostages are no longer a pressure or bargaining card," it quoted the sources as saying.

No independent confirmation was available, but speculation has grown that Rafsanjani, leader of Iran's so-called pragmatists, wanted the hostages freed as part of an effort to improve relations with the West.

McDonald's meets Moscow

MOSCOW (AP) — American fast food got off to a fast start here Wednesday, with thousands of people lining up beneath the golden arches and hammer and sickle for their first taste of a McDonald's "gamburger."

They also eagerly tried "chizburgers" and "Filay-o-feesh" sandwiches. The queue-hardened consumers seemed unfazed by the long line that snaked out the door. They moved briskly, thanks to the 27 cash registers at the world's largest McDonald's, the first of 20 planned in the Soviet Union.

"I only waited an hour and I think they served thousands before me," said a happy middle-aged woman from the aluminum plant on Dmitrovskoye Highway.

"And it was only 10 rubles for all this," she said, pointing to a bag packed with unfamiliar treats like cheeseburgers and fish sandwiches. "I'm taking it back for the girls at the factory to try."

Soldier arrested for desertion

OMAHA, Neb. (AP) — A man arrested for deserting from the Army nearly 30 years ago knew he might be picked up at the airport when he returned to the United States from East Germany. But 30 relatives who came to greet him were stunned.

"I think this must be what it was like in East Germany before the wall came down," said Arnold Kephart's sister, Alice Smith. "We do live in a free country, or so we thought."

Kephart, 53, was being held at the Fort Riley, Kan., Army base Wednesday on a warrant charging him with desertion.

He was arrested Tuesday night at Eppley Airfield by military and civilian police as relatives looked on. Kephart was allowed to talk to his 86-year-old father and sister before being taken away.

Some family members came from as far away as Arkansas to greet Kephart, who was accompanied by his son, Frankie, and who, according to his attorney, had tried to escape from East Germany several times.

Kephart will be transferred Thursday to Fort Sill, Okla., said Capt. Ed Garven, a Fort Riley spokesman.

If convicted of desertion by a court-martial, Kephart could receive a penalty ranging from a less-than-honorable discharge to up to three years in prison. Lt. Col. John Dobbs said from Fort Sill.

AIDS drug 'most potent yet'

NEW YORK (AP) — Scientists say they have created what appear to be the most potent substances yet studied for stopping the AIDS virus from reproducing, based on test-tube results.

The class of compounds apparently sabotages a process involving a virus enzyme called reverse transcriptase, the scientists said.

The compounds have not yet been tested on humans for effectiveness, but one of the substances was tried on six healthy men who tolerated it without major side effects, the researchers reported in Thursday's issue of the British journal, Nature.

Scientists conducted laboratory studies of compounds called TIBO derivatives. In their tests, the compounds inhibited reproduction of the AIDS virus at concentrations that were 10,000 to 100,000 times lower than what would kill cells.

That compares to concentrations of 100 times to 10,000 times lower than a cell-killing dose required by AZT, the only approved drug for treating acquired immune deficiency syndrome, and the experimental drugs dideoxycytidine and dideoxyinosine, the researchers said.

This test-tube potency of the new compounds may bode well for avoiding side effects, but nobody knows what would happen in humans, cautioned AIDS researcher Jay Levy of the University of California at San Francisco.

Many drugs that look promising in the test tube turn out to have unpredictable side effects, he said.

Senate approves records bill

TOPEKA (AP) — The Senate Wednesday approved, 40-0, a bill that would allow the attorney general and county prosecutors to bring complaints against officials who violate the state's Open Records Act.

The Senate also passed measures that would strengthen the state law against "party shacks" and would extend the time the State Board of Tax Appeals has to schedule property tax protests.

Under present law, a person can file suit in district court of any county to enforce the Open Meetings Act. However, lawmakers were concerned that ordinary citizens would not be able to afford to file a suit to gain access to public records. That bill now goes to the governor for his signature.

Complaints filed in case

TOPEKA (AP) — Complaints have been filed against three of four juveniles arrested after the shooting death of Paul Bramlage, son of Fred Bramlage, K-State benefactor, a Shawnee County assistant district attorney said Wednesday.

Two of the juveniles were taken into custody at the scene, and the other two were arrested later in the day.

Jean Schmidt, an assistant district attorney, said the complaint filed in juvenile court against a 16-year-old boy alleges one count of felony murder and one of attempted aggravated robbery. She said a decision had not been made on whether to seek certification for the youth to be tried as an adult.

Schmidt said that complaints had also been filed in juvenile court against a 14-year-old and 15-year-old. But she said that because of their ages she could not provide any more information on the nature or status of the cases against them.

She said no formal charges had been filed against the other juvenile, a 17-year-old, but that he was being held in jail because of a prior record. That youth had a first appearance before Shawnee County District Judge Frank Yeoman, who set bond of $100,000.

Coliseum search for multi-purpose image continues

By Tomari Quinn
Staff Reporter

Establishing Bramlage Coliseum as a multi-purpose arena depends on a variety of events ranging from basketball games to rock 'n' roll concerts, said Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage.

"We're having to establish our own niche in a market where there was no niche before, and that's caused a few problems," he said. "There's never really been a show market in Manhattan before."

Thomas said Bramlage is affected by the concert season at Sandstone Amphitheater, in Bonner Springs, Kan. The season doesn't coincide with K-State class sessions.

"One of the things we face is that we're a slave to whatever comes through our area," he said. "If something happens to be in Kansas City, Wichita or Denver and is going through the area, we can catch it. For a group to start its tour in Manhattan is just not going to happen."

Athletic Director Steve Miller said Bramlage has succeeded in providing a multi-purpose opportunity for events such as basketball, concerts and meetings.

Thomas said meetings for 2,000 to 3,000 people can also be held in Bramlage.

"I'd also like to see more arts and crafts shows of up to 110 booths," he said. "It's not easy to have a trade show, and Bramlage isn't designed for it, but we can make it work."

Thomas said a major drawback to attracting special events is the population base of Manhattan.

"Productions like Sesame Street and ice shows require a four- or five-night run," he said. "It's not that they wouldn't do well here. We've talked to them several times."

Bramlage is large enough to accommodate the productions, but may not be able to draw a capacity crowd for five straight nights, Thomas said.

Curtailed material may be purchased to cut the arena to the 2,800 to 3,500 ticket range, he said. Events too big for McCain Auditorium and too small for a full arena could be accommodated. Booking events in a half arena would also allow Thomas to lower the ticket prices.

"Eventually, I can get the small show prices down to $10 a ticket and hold maybe one show a month," he said.

Thomas said he thinks Bramlage is about a year from developing an established market, and he is still seeking shows he believes are best suited for Bramlage.

"I think there is a definite market for the smaller shows like the B-52s, Psychedelic Furs, Tracy Chapman and other groups that might be up and coming," he said.

Thomas said he is hoping to catch several groups before the beginning of the Sandstone season.

"Any group doing well on the charts right now is fair game for us," he said. "It really depends on how the tour is routed. It costs so much more to have a group come in for one show than it does to catch a group on the way through."

Bramlage cannot have a super-show every month because of the disposable income lost by having to go through an outside promoter, Thomas said. He said he can cut several dollars off the ticket price by promoting a show himself.

Thomas said he doesn't know how many tickets need to be sold to cover the cost of the Motley Crue concert, because it came through an outside promoter.

"Basically a promoter looks to make money," he said. "He's not in it for the glamour."

Thomas said promoters look for arenas that can be filled, in places where profits can be made.

"We'll try to bring in as varied entertainment as we can," Thomas said. "But a lot of things affect our market area."

He said the number of phone orders for tickets has increased for the last several shows. Bramlage has three ticket phone lines, but

Senators to debate eligibility

Constitution wording created loophole for some candidates

By Kirk Caraway
Collegian Reporter

A debate about wording changes in the Student Governing Association Constitution dealing with eligibility requirements for student body president, Student Senate and Board of Student Publications candidates is on the agenda for tonight's Senate meeting, set for 7 p.m. in the K-State Union Big Eight Room.

An amendment is scheduled for debate that would prohibit potential candidates from running for office if they plan to graduate before the term of office would expire. The proposed change will close a loophole created when the 1986-87 Senate moved elections from the spring to the fall semester.

Another proposed change would make graduate students officially eligible to run for the Board of Student Publications. Ajit Maan, graduate student in English, served on the 1988-89 Board, even though the constitution specifically restricts eligibility to undergraduates.

"I don't know why it was that way in the first place," said Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities. "It's kind of an illogical rule. I don't think it was anything that was against Student Publication rules."

"It just wasn't something you would notice and say, 'Ah ha, that person isn't supposed to do that,'" Routson said.

A vote on other wording changes in the Senate by-laws and standing rules is also scheduled to take place. The proposed by-laws revision would correct the language in Article V, section 7-C, so that it would refer to the proper section. The proposed change in standing rules would mandate the use of the newly revised version of Roberts Rules of Order to settle disputes over parliamentary procedure.

A discussion of changes in the selection of the Athletic Ticket Sales Committee members is also on the agenda. At issue is how the committee members are selected and approved. The change would exclude the current committee chairperson from helping select the next committee. If the change is approved, the student body president, senate chairperson and personnel selections coordinator will make the committee selections.

Other items to be voted on are the approval of Amy Moats, freshman in business, as coordinator for personnel selections, and Deborah Seibold, junior in pre-law, as Senate intern coordinator.

Senate members are also scheduled to vote on a resolution commending Mary Hale, senior in history and speech, and Janelle Larson, senior in animal sciences and industry and social sciences, for winning Rhodes Scholarships.

General scholarship deadline today

Applications due in Office of Student Financial Assistance

By Gregory A. Branson
Collegian Reporter

Today is the deadline for the University General Scholarship application.

All applications should be turned into the Office of Student Financial Assistance in Fairchild 104 by 5 p.m.

"If students can't get into the office by 5 p.m., they can drop their applications into the drop box outside Fairchild," said Larry Moeder, associate director of Student Financial Assistance. Mailed applications need to be postmarked by today.

Moeder said the general scholarship application allows students to apply for all scholarships they are eligible for in one step.

"The one application covers all general, or unrestricted scholarships, plus all the departmental scholarships," Moeder said.

A general scholarship is open to all students on campus, regardless of their major or department.

"All the funds that have been given to K-State for scholarship purposes will be awarded through this application," he said.

Scholarships restricted to students from certain counties or high schools are also awarded through this application.

Once the applications are received, they are entered into a computer that matches applicants with their grade point averages and scholarships.

Students can be eligible for more than one scholarship.

"We'll match each student with every scholarship they're eligible for," Moeder said. "We guarantee that any student turning in an application by today, with a 3.7 GPA, will receive at least $700 in scholarship assistance."

More than 5,000 scholarships will be awarded.

"We award about $5 million in scholarships," Moeder said. "Approximately 12 to 15 percent of the students at K-State receive a scholarship through this application."

Students can still submit their applications after today, but they will be held until after the initial awards have been made.

"If there are any funds left over, the late applications will be considered," Moeder said.

Although 90 percent of the scholarships at K-State are based solely on merit, part of the other 10 percent are based on financial need. These scholarships require an ACT Family Financial Statement to be on file by March 15.

Moeder said general and unrestricted scholarships will be awarded in February. Departmental and college scholarships will be awarded in March, and need-based scholarships immediately after March 15.

Death can be most humane treatment

"Death is a punishment to some, to some a gift, and to many a favour." — Lucius Annaeus Seneca

"It is the duty of a doctor to prolong life. It is not his duty to prolong the act of dying." — Lord Thomas Horder

In the early hours of January 11, 1983, a 1963 Nash Rambler left the road in southwest Missouri. Its driver, 25-year-old Nancy Cruzan, having fallen asleep, was thrown from the vehicle as the car careened wildly out of control. Landing face-down in a pool of water in the ditch, Nancy Cruzan died. That is, the Nancy Cruzan parents and friends knew died. The body of Nancy Cruzan was resuscitated by paramedics and now resides in the Missouri Rehabilitation Center in Mount Vernon, Mo., the cruel, if not unusual, product of modern medical techniques. Nancy Cruzan has been in a persistent vegetative state for seven years.

This spring, the U.S. Supreme Court will decide the fate of Nancy Cruzan. Her parents, Joe and Joyce Cruzan, decided years ago that Nancy would not want to continue living in a deep coma, sustained only by the tube which that her. So they want the tube unhooked, which would kill her by dehydration. It is the least they could do for someone they love.

I must have been about 13, maybe 14. My family's recent move into a new house in the small, western Kansas town we had called home for the last five years had generated a large amount of unwanted items. My father and I were spending one of my precious Saturdays loading an old, homemade trailer with the accumulated odds and ends of the six people I called my family.

Like most memories of my youth, the recall always seems brighter than reality. I don't know if that is because it was always a sunny day, or simply the particular tint my memories acquire with age.

Our destination, the local landfill, was on the edge of town, not far from a dried creek bed my brother and I used to hike to. On the Saturdays of my youth, with canteen and BB gun in hand, and visions of adventure in mind, we would set out on one of our weekend journeys to the timber. The old creek bed had everything two young boys could want out of life — large, craggy trees, an occasional stagnant pool of water, an abundance of wildlife and tons of sand. More importantly, if you followed the creek a mile or so, you went right by the landfill.

What is so special about a landfill? JUNK. To a boy, it is the stuff dreams are made of. We spent many glorious hours exploring the huge pit. It was like a museum without the "Do Not Touch" signs. It was treasure. And it was free.

Brad Seabourn

Collegian Columnist

I was preoccupied with these fond thoughts as my father and I slowly drove the car and trailer to the landfill on that day when I was 13, maybe 14.

As we approached the entrance to the landfill, I realized it had been a while since I had been to the "junkyard," as we used to call it. Not that I no longer found it interesting. It was, simply, one of the rituals of youth that fall by the wayside as young adulthood sets in.

My father and I unloaded the trailer in silence. It had been a long day, and we simply wanted to get the work done as quickly as possible so we could go home. I don't remember who heard the sound first, but one of us stopped and listened, and then the other obliged himself to do the same, not really knowing why.

There it was again.

We both looked at each other, and then turned and walked cautiously to the edge of the pit. It was a human sound ... or rather, it had a quality about it that made it feel human. It was a sound that spoke directly to the heart, a sound that any living thing could identify with, a sound that spoke of pain and suffering and weariness all in one little ... whimper.

Dad and I carefully climbed down into the pit, following the sound to its source. As we lifted an old washing machine out of the way, we discovered that the source of the disturbing sound was a puppy that had somehow gotten its head accidentally pinned under the discarded washing machine. The constant, heavy pressure of the machine had literally flattened the head of this unfortunate creature into B-movie reality — a grotesque, bugged, Nightmare-on-Elm-Street-Creepshow caricature, with crawling things and raw, rotting flesh to accentuate the stench that assaulted the nostrils.

We stood there staring, unmoving, for what seemed like a very long time. The animal whined with every exhaled breath. I was beginning to get sick. It was obvious from the emaciated appearance of this ... this thing-that-was-no-longer-a-puppy, that it had been there at least a week, maybe more, slowly starving to death as the intense pain gradually engulfed every bit of remaining consciousness. The situation was as much repulsive as it was sorrowful. It was one of those sights of such searing emotional intensity that make you recognize immediately you will never be the same again.

Looking back, I suppose it was my first encounter with life and death in a real sense. And in a somewhat narrower context, it was an abrupt confrontation with my own mortality. For the first time, I realized the importance of quality in the living of life. Without question, the quality of life for this poor animal before us was of such a state that death would be a welcome improvement.

My father gently lifted the pup into his arms and carried it to the car. It was decided that since we did not have the means to humanely sacrifice the dog, we would leave it at the nearby animal shelter for disposal. It was the least we could do.

"If thou and nature can so gently part, the stroke of death is as a lover's pinch, which hurts, and is desired." — William Shakespeare.

Airline accident raises questions about safety

Another air disaster. The plane ran out of fuel.

Who's fault was it this time? A big debate. Who's name is tarnished, who's is not? Who gets fired, who does not?

Some say the regional air traffic controller did not relay to the local controller that the information flight was low on fuel. Some say this is why the flight was put into a holding pattern instead of being allowed to land.

Was it the pilot's fault?

Some say the pilot never declared a fuel emergency, or said the magic words, "minimum fuel." If the controllers had heard these words, some say, they would have given the flight priority landing clearance immediately. The pilot only reported the plane "would run out of fuel," and that five minutes in a holding pattern was about "all they could do." Some say those are ambiguous phrases.

Or how about the airline?

Did the fact the plane was 23 years old have an effect on the outcome of the crash? Did metal fatigue make the plane crack into three pieces on contact with the ground? What if the plane had stayed intact? Some say 23 years is not a long service period for an airplane. Some people want to save money.

Some say that in the great scheme of things, mass transit is much safer than traveling in an automobile. But the difference is mass transit passengers are putting their lives into the hands of people they have never met, and probably never will. Mass transit passengers rely on the faith that controllers, pilots, ground crew, and fuel attendants are doing their jobs correctly and consistently.

In this rapid age, people often do not have a practical travel alternative to flying. Considering the number of people who travel by airplane each year, it is incredible that few steps have been taken to lessen the attention load on individual air traffic controllers, and to ensure that everyone involved in the airline industry does his job.

So who's fault was it this time? It wasn't the passengers' fault. 73 dead, 85 injured.

Cartoons aren't so bad

I had a great column all planned out for today. I was all set to write about how awful kid's television was — sexist, unimaginative, and consisting mostly of program-length advertisements.

I had my thesis statement (I passed Comp I): Children's programming, specifically Saturday morning cartoons, needs regulating and it needs it now. I even had quotes from Education Digest that pretty much reamed the entire children's television industry.

I had an issue, I had quotes from experts, I had the protecting-the-innocent element — everything I needed for a good, passionate, opinionated column. I was set. It was time to do a little research and watch a morning's worth of cartoons — no problem. I'm no glutton for punishment; I slept in and taped them.

Sunday, I plugged the tape of the previous morning's cartoons into the VCR and settled down with some popcorn and a notebook. I had a mission. I would record all the awful things I saw and pass them on to the public. Oh, sure, I had to suffer through all those cartoons, but heck, I figured it was my duty as a responsible citizen to warn you of the sexism and violence and thirty-minute-long commercials and, well, just the general awfulness of the television we're offering our kids. Well, kids in general. I don't have any, but lots of people do.

Okay, maybe I picked the wrong channel or maybe it was the wrong morning, but the picture wasn't nearly as bleak as Education Digest painted it. So instead of reaming Saturday morning television, I wound up reviewing it. And because I was looking for all those bad things, I found myself noticing all the good ones. Oh well, another passionate cause out the window.

My "morning" started out with what I later learned is considered (by USA Today at least) the number one new cartoon this year — "The Gummi Bears/Winnie the Pooh Hour" by Disney. The Gummi Bears didn't do much for me, I admit. Maybe it's because I don't like them as a candy. But they weren't nearly as stupid as I was expecting. I figured they would be like the Smurfs — sickly sweet, but it wasn't and it had nothing to do with the candy at all. I still don't know why the cartoon bears are "gummi." They don't, like, stick to walls during the show.

Karin Dell'Antonia

Collegian Columnist

Winnie the Pooh was great. The cartoon had the same characters and voices I remember from the specials that used to play on prime time — cute, but not too cute. It had a message but not a big one. It even had me chuckling a few times. Granted, I have always liked Pooh, but I was looking for faults. I didn't want it to be as great as the Pooh I remembered, but it was. And since I have a feeling my memories are a little rosy, the show had a lot to live up to.

I checked out the commercials while I was at this, because they're a big part of the complaint against children's programming. There were no commercials for show-related products in any of the five hours I watched, and no, I didn't fast-forward them. The only cartoon characters who showed up during commercial time were Bugs and Daffy, and not on a commercial. They were in an educational spot about the Constitution. The network does do one thing I'm not sure is fair — they stick little cartoons with clowns telling really old jokes in the middle of the commercials. I can see how this would be confusing, but I'm not sure it's cause for damning an entire industry.

Most of the commercials were very repetitive. I think most kids must catch on. The darn things weren't sexist, either. Lots of them were cute — like the starlet in the Fruit Loops commercial who was thrilled when the Toucan gave her "another nose job."

The next program was "Slimer and the Real Ghostbusters," which I thought would be awful. I also thought I would find sexism, finally, because in one segment the bosses were all guys and the secretary was a girl. In the second segment the secretary turned out to save the guys and pretty much be a stud. Besides, the other secretary is a guy. On top of all this, the cartoon turned out to be funny, and my original column premise was shot. The characters were right out of the movies and the lines were all perfect. How can you resist a show where the ghosts kidnap the guys and put them in a ghost-hell with harmonica elevator music and then throw them into the "armpit"? (I'm sure you can imagine the "armpit" if you try, so I won't describe it.)

Poor animation was my one complaint about the "Ghostbusters" cartoon. The character's faces stayed still while they ran and the background was stagnant.

Ghostbusters was followed by another movie take-off — "Beetlejuice," which didn't do anything more to prove my thesis. Lydia and Beetlejuice, disguised as Betty Juice, ugly schoolgirl. They took Lydia's two wimpy friends camping in the "netherworlds" to make real women of them (and dam it, there's no sexism in that).

The animation in "Beetlejuice" was hilarious. It looked like the movie — the woods were alive and Beetlejuice was, of course, never still. More puns were included — the woods featured hedgehogs, weeping willows and crabgrass — but that's what kids like and I can't find anything wrong with that. Both "Beetlejuice" and "Ghostbusters" had my roommates and I laughing out loud. It's been a long time since a cartoon did that.

OK, so some of the afternoon cartoons like "Jem" and "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles" may have their problems. ("Turtles" is funny, though. I watched it once when I was supposed to be studying for an accounting test. This was reflected in my test score.)

Cartoons beat the hell out of the prime time offerings for the night we were watching, so why not try them? Tape a few cartoons some morning and have a party with them. Relive your childhood and dispel those doubts that kids today are not what they used to be. "Speedybuggy" and "Superfriends" may be gone, but the replacements aren't, when you think about it honestly, any worse. In fact — though this may sound like sacrilege — they may be better.

Eisenhower's aide recalls service days

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — LeRoy Bateson went scurrying for his scrapbook following the first news reports about the centennial of Dwight D. Eisenhower's birth this year.

Among the photos from his days in the Air Force are mementos from a month he spent as Eisenhower's military aide, including an autographed photo of Eisenhower and a penknife engraved with the president's initials.

Bateson, 60, who lives in the Lake Dabinawa area of Jefferson County, said he was Eisenhower's military aide in 1954 while the president was at Lowry Air Force Base in Denver, where Ike and his wife spent leisure time.

Bateson enlisted in the Air Force in 1951 and was trained as a B-29 gunner but found himself stationed at Lowry when the bomber was mothballed.

He started every day as military aide by meeting the president at 7:15 a.m., getting his coffee and generally doing "everything I could do to make his stay as nice as possible," Bateson said. But he spent little time chatting with the president.

Matteucci lifts Lady Cats, 66-56

Margaret Clarkin/Staff

Lady Cat forward Shella Cherry puts up a jump shot over Oklahoma State guard Jodi Fisher in K-State's 66-56 victory over the Cowgirls.

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

The way K-State's Rita Matteucci played last night in the Lady Cats' 66-56 victory over Oklahoma State, probably has a lot of people wondering what could happen next on the Lady Cats squad.

When the Big Eight Conference opened play last month, the Lady Cats began a six-game stretch that saw them go undefeated and rack up three-straight conference player-of-the-week honors.

Lady Cats' fans are now talking about a possible fourth-straight weekly player honor, and, get this, by the fourth different person.

Matteucci fired the Lady Cats to their seventh-straight win with a 20-point outburst in which she hit 8-of-9 floor shots to pace the Lady Cats.

The performance was a season high for Matteucci, just five points short of her career-high of 25, and she also grabbed a game-high nine rebounds.

"Rita played very good and very smart tonight," K-State interim head coach Gaye Griffin said. "In the defense they were running, Rita really allowed herself to move around and step up there in the free-throw lane."

"That's her shot and she needs to take that," Griffin said.

The 5-foot-11, senior forward from Albuquerque, N.M., did what she does best all evening long Wednesday; she moved without the ball, and, according to Griffin, that's how Matteucci got her points against an Oklahoma State defense that seemed to be more cautious of the Big Eight's past three players of the week, Nadira Hazim, Diana Miller and Kristie Bahner."

"I have a feeling that's why we're 7-0 (in the conference)," Griffin said. "You can't just guard Rita, or Kristie Bahner, or Nadira Hazim, or Diana Miller."

"You can't just stop one. You have to stop all five people on the floor to be effective against the Lady Cats."

"We were talking in practice Monday about who No. 4 would be and it was unanimous that we thought it should be Rita," senior guard Elyse Funk said of the possibility of Matteucci garnering the award next week.

— Gaye Griffin
Lady Cats' coach

Matteucci was a big reason why K-State was able to rally from a 35-31 deficit early in the second half. The Lady Cats had taken a 29-26 lead into the lockerroom at the intermission, but Oklahoma State jumped out of the second-half gates with a quick 9-2 spurt to take the lead.

In the next 10:59, however, Matteucci would tally 12 of her 20 points to spark K-State to a 55-49 lead with six minutes remaining.

The Lady Cats would outscore Oklahoma State, 11-7, the rest of the way, and it was only fitting that Matteucci's two free throws with :15 seconds left sealed the victory.

The win moved the Lady Cats a full two games ahead of Oklahoma State and Kansas in the Big Eight race. K-State, now 7-0 and 15-5 overall, travels to Missouri Sunday to face the Tigers at 3:30 p.m. In the two teams' first meeting of the year, K-State used a 19-point effort from Miller to defeat the Tigers, 66-53.

LADY CAT NOTES: Two Lady Cats went over the 1,000-point total for their career. Juniors Nadira Hazim and Diana Miller became the 17th and 18th players in K-State women's basketball history to complete the feat ... Miller now has 1,009 career points, while Hazim has 1,006 ... With Wednesday's performance, Miller also became only the ninth player at K-State to join the 1,000-point/500-rebound club.

STILLWATER, Okla. — Royce Jeffries scored 21 points, 10 of them during a five-minute span in the second half as Oklahoma State beat K-State, 89-67, Wednesday night.

The Cowboys (12-7, 3-4) also got 24 points from Byron Houston, seven of them early in the second half as they built a 22-point lead.

K-State (12-9, 2-3) went on an 18-5 run midway through the second half to close the gap to 59-50.

Oklahoma State, which shot 67 percent from the field, scored 27 of its final 35 points from the free throw line.

Jean Derouillere led the Wildcats with 16 points while John Rettiger added 14.

The Cowboys took their biggest lead of the first half, 41-25, on Darwyn Alexander's three-pointer at the buzzer. Oklahoma State also got three-pointers in the early going to build its lead.

Mattias Sahlstrom, a 6-foot-10 center from Sweden, drained two of them and John Potter added another as the Cowboys jumped out to a 22-11 midway through the half.

Rider charged in theft

By The Associated Press

IOLA — Former K-State basketball signee J.R. Rider, who is currently starring at Allen County Community College because of academic woes in high school, has been charged with stealing a ring from another student.

Allen County Attorney Nanette Kemmerly-Weber filed burglary and misdemeanor theft charges Tuesday against Rider, 18. He is accused of taking the ring from a dormitory room in November. Rider is scheduled to appear in Allen County District Magistrate Court Wednesday.

City Attorney Charles Apt also filed a misdemeanor battery charge this week against Rider, based on a complaint from the student who said Rider stole his ring. Apt said the alleged offense took place on Jan. 19. That trial is set for Feb. 21 in municipal court.

Rider, a 6-foot-5 freshman forward from Alameda, Calif., is averaging 29.4 points a game, the best of any Kansas community college player. The Red Devils are 10-11 this season.

Coach Neil Crane said Wednesday the charges against Rider would not affect his status on the team.

Rider originally signed a letter of intent to attend K-State during the early signing period in 1988, but did not qualify for admission because he wasn't a high school graduate.

Tigers, 'Hawks, Sooners grab Big 8 wins

By The Associated Press

In Big Eight Conference action Wednesday night, No. 1 Missouri held off Iowa State, 95-93; No. 9 Oklahoma romped past Nebraska, 105-64; and No. 2 Kansas defeated Colorado, 90-69. Here's a recap:

No. 1 Missouri 95,

Iowa State 93

At Ames, Iowa, sophomore Anthony Peeler scored a career-high 42 points and fed freshman Travis Ford for the game-winning basket with 5 seconds left as No. 1-ranked Missouri escaped with the victory over Iowa State.

Peeler broke a Hilton Coliseum record and tied a 21-year-old Missouri mark by making 20 straight free throws in lifting the Tigers to their first victory at Iowa State since 1984.

The old Hilton Coliseum record for free throws in a game was 17 by K-State's Steve Henson in 1988. Peeler tied a Missouri record first set by Don Tomlinson against Iowa State in 1969.

After Iowa State's Victor Alexander sank two free throws with 39 seconds left to tie the score at 93, Missouri worked the ball until Peeler again found Ford on the right baseline and he made another 18-footer for the game winner. The two late baskets were Ford's only points of the second half. Iowa State was unable to get off a final shot before the buzzer sounded.

No. 9 Oklahoma 105,

Nebraska 64

At Norman, Okla., Damon Patterson scored 20 points, and Jackie Jones had 16 points and 13 rebounds in leading ninth-ranked Oklahoma over Nebraska.

The victory, Oklahoma's 41st straight at home, left the Sooners 15-2 overall and 4-1 in the Big Eight heading into Saturday's game at No. 2 Kansas. Nebraska dropped to 7-11 and 0-5 while losing its 15th straight road game.

Oklahoma took a 10-2 lead in the first 4½ minutes, then broke the game open for good with a 20-4 run later in the half that made it 37-16.

Terrence Mullins came off the bench and scored all 10 of his points during the run, including two three-pointers. Nebraska helped the Sooners by missing the front end of four 1-and-1s during the spurt.

Skeeter Henry scored 16 points for Oklahoma. Nebraska was led by Dapreis Owens with 16 points and Carl Hayes with 15.

No. 2 Kansas 90,

Colorado 69

In Lawrence, Mark Randall and Rick Calloway led a balanced scoring attack as No. 2 Kansas swamped Colorado to give the Buffaloes their 47th straight Big Eight road loss.

The Jayhawks (21-1 overall, 4-1 in the Big Eight) led by nine points six minutes into the game, and fashioned a 48-27 halftime advantage as Colorado (9-10, 1-5) lost in Lawrence for the 27th time in 29 years.

The Buffs shot 37 percent for the game and had one six-minute stretch in the first half when they scored just one field goal as Kansas won its 13th consecutive home game. The Jayhawks went into the game with the NCAA's best field goal percentage at 54.6 percent.

It was 15-8 when Kansas went on a 14-6 run, with seven different players scoring, for a 29-14 lead midway through the half.

Freeman West's three-point play gave Kansas a 71-39 bulge with 11:48 still left in the game before the second half got sloppy on both ends.

Illini face possible infractions for hoop recruiting allegations

By The Associated Press

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. — Illinois basketball coach Lou Henson is standing by Jimmy Collins, his chief recruiter, who has been a key figure in allegations of irregularities in basketball recruiting at the school.

An NCAA investigation is believed to have ended Tuesday and Illinois is expecting a letter of official inquiry from the association later this week.

Illinois will have approximately 60 days to respond to any charges.

"I believe in Jimmy, I'm 100 percent supportive of him through this," Henson said Wednesday. "Anyone might inadvertently break a rule in recruiting, but it will be a surprise to me if a major rule was broken."

The NCAA has been checking into possible irregularities in the recruitment of 6-foot-9 forward Deon Thomas, a 1989 graduate of Chicago Simon who had been one of the nation's top prep prospects.

Iowa assistant coach Bruce Pearl has given the NCAA a tape recording of a telephone conversation in which Thomas reportedly said he received $80,000 and a car for attending Illinois.

Thomas, a freshman, has been withheld from competition this season by the Fighting Illini pending completion of the probe.

In another development, Notre Dame's LaPhonso Ellis reportedly has told the NCAA that he was offered an automobile and an $85,000 package to attend Illinois. Ellis graduated in 1988 from East St. Louis, Ill., Lincoln after leading the school to successive Class AA Illinois High School championships.

Collins, barred from recruiting until the matter is settled, disputes the allegations.

"I've been a straightforward recruiter," he said. "I haven't done anything to violate the NCAA rules."

During a Big Ten coaches teleconference Tuesday, Collins said of the ordeal: "I'd be lying if I said it has been a vacation. It's been very tough because we've been instructed by the NCAA not to say anything.

"I think once people start learning what has happened and learn the truth of the situation — that's my reason for thinking it will work out," Collins said.

"I've always been one to think justice will prevail in the end," he said.

"I know and the NCAA knows Bruce Pearl has done some things," Collins said. "But I don't want to get (Iowa) in trouble anymore than that university itself wants to get us in trouble."

Pearl, who has said Iowa did not turn Illinois in for the recruitment of Thomas, says he taped the conversation with Thomas to protect himself because Iowa had been accused of illegal recruiting practices.

Iowa did nothing illegal in seeking to recruit Thomas, he said.

But Thomas said earlier this week that Iowa, not Illinois, offered him money and a car as an incentive to play basketball there.

Royals tickets going fast

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Royals have sold out their opening day earlier than ever before — and season tickets have been selling at a record pace.

Herk Robinson, the Royals' executive vice president for administration, announced the sellout Wednesday for the April 9 home-opener against the Baltimore Orioles. The earliest date previously for an opening day sellout was last March 1.

The Royals said 5,000 general admission tickets will go on sale for opening day starting at 11:30 a.m. April 9.

Robinson said the Royals have sold more than 15,400 season tickets for the 1990 season. The previous high was 15,000 for the 1981 season.

Dorsett hangs it up

DENVER — Tony Dorsett has made it official: He is retiring after 13 seasons as an NFL running back.

Dorsett, a virtual lock for the NFL's Hall of Fame after finishing his career as the league's No. 2 all-time rusher with 12,739 yards, sat out the 1989 season after undergoing reconstructive knee surgery as a result of a training camp injury. It was his second season in Denver after 11 years with the Dallas Cowboys.

"I'm through," Dorsett told the Rocky Mountain News in a telephone interview from his Dallas home on Tuesday. "It's official. I don't have any immediate plans except to relax. I want to try to get my knee back to normal."

Dorsett indicated earlier this month that his career most likely was over, and said he hoped to get a job in broadcasting.

Group's music reflects multiple sources

By Joann Beckman
Collegian Reporter

A tidal wave is approaching the campus. Tsunami means "big wave" in Japanese, and it is also the name of a band performing at 8 p.m. today in the K-State Union Forum Hall.

Although Tsunami is usually referred to as a jazz band, its music is a blend of various influences.

Stanley Davis, the band's bassist, said, "We draw from roots of rhythm and blues, jazz and classical chamber music."

He said Robert Schlesinger, keyboardist, has a classical and bebop jazz background. "I have a rhythm and blues background," Davis said.

Brenda Farney, Tsunami's agent, said the group's music has been described as pop, flash and fusion.

"They have excerpts that range from jazz standards to contemporary adult fusion," she said.

"When we go into improvised parts of a song, we all improvise," Davis said. "I think that's what sets us apart."

Schlesinger and Davis founded Tsunami on New Year's Eve 1986, Davis said.

"That was when we met," he said. "We were playing a pick-up gig."

Davis said he and Schlesinger really hit it off and have been playing together ever since.

They named themselves Tsunami because it sounded nice, Davis said.

"When people ask us what it means we tell them it's Japanese for a jazz band from Denver without a saxophonist," he said.

Davis attended the University from 1967 to 1971, majoring in technical journalism. He studied music at Berklee College in Boston. He lived, performed and recorded in Europe from 1974 to 1978. He now lives in Estes Park, Colo.

Paul Kaaren, drummer, joined the group in November 1989. He has been a studio musician in Denver for the past 10 years. He has toured with regional rock, rhythm and blues and fusion groups.

Guitarist Loek Schreivers joined the band in 1989, and Tsunami toured as a quartet.

Schreivers will not be coming to Manhattan with the band.

Karen Smaldone, Union Program Council program adviser, said she saw Tsunami for the first time at a National Association for Campus Activities conference.

She said at the conference a variety of acts, including bands and comedians, perform.

"Different schools from the region go to the conference, and then you buy the acts cooperatively with the other schools in the region," she said. "It's cheaper that way."

"Tsunami is very good at what it does," Smaldone said.

Admission to Tsunami's performance is $2.

BIG RIVER!

Sunday, February 11, 3:30 p.m.

The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn comes to the stage in a Tony Award-winning Broadway musical that's as big as all outdoors. Roger Miller's lyrics capture the essence of Mark Twain's colorful characters and his tuneful score blends bluegrass and gospel with just the right touch of Nashville. Splendid sets provide a memorable backdrop for the crooks and con men, kindly kinfolk and starchy spinsters Huck encounters on his journey to becoming one of the greatest creations in American fiction.

Area businesses entice students with coupons

By The Collegian Staff

After surviving the hectic K-State fee payment system, students are rewarded with books containing coupons from area businesses.

The coupon books are sponsored by the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and distributed free of charge to students.

The purpose of the coupon books is to familiarize students with Manhattan businesses and draw new customers to the stores.

"We're certainly interested in having the students be aware of what merchants and businesses are in Manhattan," said Randy Martin, president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce. "It provides incentive for them to go meet those merchants."

Don Carrel, owner of Kitchens Plus, said the reason he puts coupons in the book is to acquaint new students with the store.

"It has brought in some new students," said Leanne Williams, manager of Kitchens Plus.

Daneen Hilger, an employee of Aggie Hair Shapers, said the shop puts coupons in the book to attract new clientele.

"People who would otherwise not walk in, will because of the savings on the coupon," she said.

To compile the coupon book, the Chamber of Commerce contacts its members to see if they would like to have coupons in the book. If a business wishes to participate, the Chamber of Commerce provides information about the cost, Martin said.

The money collected from businesses is used to cover the cost of production, he said.

Restoring may harm homes

Registration eligibility may be lost by preservation attempts

By Todd Ubben
Collegian Reporter

Older homes in Manhattan and the surrounding community might be eligible to be listed in historical registers if they are not ruined in the process of preservation.

Robert Beardsley, who received a master's degree in architecture historic preservation from the University, is teaching a four-session course, "Historical Preservation of Your Home," sponsored by UFM.

The class sessions begin today. Beardsley contacted UFM last fall about teaching the course, according to Peg Kowalczyk, educational program coordinator.

"It was just a unique idea in his area of expertise," she said.

Beardsley said the National Register of Historic Places is a listing kept by the Department of the Interior of historic and otherwise important buildings or areas.

The homes usually have to relate to natural history or some natural style.

Preservation of old homes without proper historical research may not only destroy the character of homes, but also make them ineligible for historic register nominations, Beardsley said.

"You find out a lot of things that you didn't know," Beardsley said, "and one of the basic tenets of historical preservation is 'do no harm.'"

Two good examples of Queen Anne style houses, popular near the end of the 19th century, can be found in Manhattan, according to Beardsley.

One of the houses, located north of the Manhattan post office, has been perfectly preserved, he said. The other house, south of Pierre Street, has plastic hanging off of it.

A trend in putting historic sites in context with their surrounding area is developing, Beardsley said.

"People are tending to do that more than putting up plastic siding, which is nice because they're starting to take a look at the way things were," he said.

Beardsley hopes students will gain some appreciation of what historic preservation is and some ideas about how to refurbish their own homes.

"I think one of the main goals of a class like this is just to build up an awareness in the community about what we have and that we ought to keep it," he said. "Architecture, to a great extent in a community, is what connects one generation to the next."

Beardsley said students will learn how to research the history of their homes as well as how to fill out nomination forms for the National Register.

Other topics to be covered include foundation and masonry, wooden members and trim, interiors and detailing, and services such as electricity and plumbing.

Beardsley is currently working on a master's degree in environmental planning.

Overcrowding causes relocations in Union

By The Collegian Staff

Because of overcrowding and heavy traffic, the business office on the first floor of the K-State Union will be moved to the third floor, where the copy center used to be located, said Jack Thoman, business manager.

The check cashing office, one of the Union's most-used services, will remain on the first floor. The copy center is now on the first floor next to the TV lounge.

"We have outgrown the first-floor office physically," Thoman said.

The traffic in and out of the office during the day has also been a problem, he said.

Being on the first floor, the office was used by a lot of students asking for directions and questions about the Union, Thoman said.

"We hope the move will limit the outside interruptions," he said.

Thoman said completion of the third-floor business office is set for mid-March.

The K-State maintenance crew is doing much of the work, which Thoman said is saving on the costs of construction and remodeling.

"We are fortunate enough to have people who have the skills to do the work," he said.

The wiring and wall and framework repairs are being done by the maintenance crew.

Contractors will be hired to lay carpet, install lighting, paint, do finishing work and purchase furniture.

"The construction of a vault for the office will also be contracted out," Thoman said.

The move is being funded by the Union. State and University dollars will not be used to fund the move, he said.

"The larger office will provide more quiet space to work and will be less stressful," Thoman said. "We're looking forward to the move."

Satire books enjoyed by students

Misstatements by Dan Quayle rank high among political comedy books

By Todd Ubben
Collegian Reporter

"The Dan Quayle Quiz Book" and other political satire books seem to be popular reading material among students, said Ruth Sidhom, general book-buyer at the K-State Union Bookstore.

Among college students, political satire books seem to be in higher demand than political biographies, Sidhom said.

The satirical book about Vice President Quayle is selling moderately well at Waldenbooks, manager Jane Huenneke said.

"The first shipment that we got in was for approximately 10 copies. We did sell out, and I did have to reorder it," Huenneke said.

The 127-page paperback, written by Jeremy Solomon and Ken Brady, was released in 1989. Huenneke said the book is set up in a multiple-choice format. A situation is set up, a question is asked about it and mock answers are given in quotation form.

All the quotes in the book were originally published in major market publications.

"It provokes a lot of comments about what would happen if Dan Quayle were to take over," Huenneke said.

Huenneke said that Waldenbooks gets roughly 75 percent of its business from military personnel. However, mostly college students buy the quiz book.

Students easily notice the book display because it is located next to the checkout, Huenneke said.

"(Students) have more discretionary income, I think, for something like this," she said.

The book also sells well on its own merits, Huenneke said.

"A lot of it has to do with the fact that he's probably got the biggest collection of ridiculous quotes of any politician out right now," she said.

The idea for this type of satire book is not completely new.

but we see little change in Soviet strategic modernization. ... But the time is right to move forward on a conventional arms-control agreement to move us to more appropriate levels of military forces in Europe."

His troop cutback proposal won immediate praise from Democrats, including Sen. Sam Nunn, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, who said it fit "the changing circumstances in Europe and the fiscal pressures" at home.

Bush also announced plans to withdraw all of the nearly 14,000 troops sent to Panama in an invasion to oust Gen. Manuel Antonio Noriega "well before the end of February."

Democrats and Republicans alike, assembled in joint session of Congress to hear the president, stood in ovation when Bush said, "One year ago, the people of Panama lived in fear, under the thumb of a dictator. Today, democracy is restored, Panama is free."

Foley agreed with much of what Bush said, but said that on some points, Democrats disagree. Foley said Bush cannot become the "education president," if his budget for fiscal 1991 includes only a 2 percent increase in spending for education.

The speaker also said Democrats will fight the administration on child care, clean air legislation, capital gains and the issue of abortion.

President Bush proposed planting one billion trees a year and improving and expanding public parks and forests.

"The trees would help remove carbon dioxide, a greenhouse gas which effects global warming, from the atmosphere," Keith Lynch, K-State forestry professor, said. "Young, growing trees would definitely help remove and lower the carbon content in the atmosphere."

Lynch said the trees would also help filter unwanted matter, but how much is yet to be determined.

"The trees are definitely a step in the right direction," he said.

are hunting on their own, they are able to catch live prey, they are flying well and doing well in general," Bradley said.

Before it is released, an animal undergoes a "flight physical" by the doctors, Wallace said. The group then sets a date for the animal's release.

Project Release is in the process of developing a statewide transportation network to let people bring injured wildlife to many different zoos to get them to Project Release.

Last year, the group rehabilitated and released 51 wild animals and numerous song birds. It also had eight non-releasable animals that were sent to area zoos.

Bradley said if people find an injured wild animal and plan to bring it in, they should protect themselves by throwing a coat or blanket over the animal and contact the veterinary clinic to have it treated.

to show the library's needs to the State Legislature, Wefald said in the release.

Wefald said the last study, done in 1982, was not accurate and overestimated the available space.

"It's not to convince President Wefald, the Board of Regents or the Dean of Libraries that the library needs an addition," he said. "The first thing the Legislature will ask us for is a study of library needs."

"We need an objective, scientific investigation," he said.

Coffman said the University has maintained a leadership role in the library from the beginning.

At Student Senate Thursday, Hostetter was critical of library support on the part of the KSU Foundation and past administrations.

"I don't want anyone to think I'm at odds with the administration," Hostetter said. "I just wanted to express the condition the library is in."

He said for an increase in funding to occur, additional methods of fundraising must be initiated.

The library has been affected by lack of funding for several years. In January 1988, over $300,000 in journal subscriptions had to be cancelled due to the devaluation of the dollar against foreign currencies.

Wefald said he was unfamiliar with the cuts and would need to take a look at the figures before commenting.

Coffman said the primarily scientific-research journals were lost due to inflation. He said the library still has a variety of magazines, but has fewer duplicates.

"Hopefully with new funding we can get back to where we were before and restore the cuts," said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries. "We would like to be able to add to our journal list."

Hobrock said recent attention on the library is partly due to new Student Body President Todd Johnson's attempts to acquire library funding. "He (Johnson) has decided to make the library an issue," Hobrock said. "The University has been working on it for years, but now people know more about it."

In the past, library funding has come from the state, Wefald said. However, the proposed art museum at the University must be privately funded, he said.

The Essential Edge Campaign, a national effort by the University and supporters to raise $100 million, includes a $4 million goal for an art museum and a $3 million goal for the library.

"I think the students, alumni and people across the state can pass along the message that each university can use more funding," Wefald said.

understand." Taxpayers were unsure of what the 1986 classification amendment would do to tax prices, until they were reappraised, Hayden said. This "clear amendment" is likely to be passed, unlike five other proposals which would revise the 1986 amendment, he said.

The proposal has been criticized by Democrats who say it doesn't adequately provide for school districts and other taxing units. Republicans have expressed optimism, claiming the amendment will satisfy taxpayers, especially with the decision going to local governments and voters.

Books

"I think I did see a couple of the humor books that had some quotes attributed to (former President Ronald) Reagan," Huenneke said.

Misstatements seem to be a politician's worst fear, said Margery Ambrosius, assistant professor of political science.

"Reagan, Bush and Quayle seem to have been more prone than usual to misstatements," she said.

Merlin Gustafson, professor of political science, said, "I think much of the media has been critical of Quayle."

Gustafson cited media exposure as a key difference in the quotability of President Bush as compared to Reagan.

"President Bush seems to be more accessible to the press," he said.

Campus space near capacity

Farrell, architecture buildings among those with shortage

By Anne Krauss
Collegian Reporter

Farrell Library is nearing full capacity, the College of Architecture and Design has studios in at least two buildings besides Seaton Hall and the College of Business Administration is faced with severe restrictions for faculty offices.

These are just a few of the problems resulting from a 14 percent shortage of space on campus.

The 1989 report prepared by the Facilities Planning Office showed that the University was operating with a space deficiency of 597,000 square feet. This figure was determined using standards and guidelines established by the Kansas Board of Regents.

In the Proposed Long Range Building Request for fiscal years 1991 to 2001, the University ranked 15 projects according to their order of importance. The top five of those projects scheduled for fiscal years 1991 to 1995 include, in order:

■ Handicapped access, at $1,195,000 to provide access to three of the University's buildings most heavily used by the physically disabled.

■ Fire protection and life safety, at $517,500, to provide fire safety devices for all campus buildings. Of the 71 campus buildings, the request reports, 19 do not have any devices and the remainder have some devices, but not all that were intended.

■ Plant Sciences Complex greenhouses, at $2,120,000, and building addition, at $24,723,000, to complete Phase II of Throckmorton Hall.

■ Seaton Hall east wing renovation, at $4,200,000 to renovate and functionally adapt space from engineering shops to instructional and design drafting activities. According to the request, as a consequence of prior changes, "exits were closed and corridors diverted, leaving a chaotic and dangerous physical environment for the current users."

ridors diverted, leaving a chaotic and dangerous physical environment for the current users."

■ Calvin Hall renovation and addition, at $8,105,000, to provide renovation and new construction as necessary to accommodate the needs of the College of Business Administration.

On the building request list, which was published in July, a Farrell and computing center building addition request, which would cost $20,885,000, is listed eighth in the order on priorities. Listed 12th on the same list of priorities is another Farrell Library addition that would cost an estimated $25,112,000.

Severe deficiencies, such as Farrell, have received priority treatment from University administrators, however, Farrell has been moved up to fifth on President Jon Wefald's list of budgetary recommendations, said Charles Reagan, assistant to the president.

The University's building request list was submitted in August 1989 and does not reflect Wefald's recent decision to rank the library and computer center addition as fifth.

Constructing new buildings or renovating old ones is often suggested as a simple solution to the space problem, but lack of funding makes this difficult.

Each year the University submits budget requests for capital improvements to the regents. The regents consider this information and compile their own proposal to send to the Kansas Legislature. The Legislature then decides what degree of funding it will grant.

Completion of phased projects, consolidation of departments and renovation of aging buildings are all goals of the office, Cooper said.

"Habitually in the past, we've identified handicap needs and fire

Three car pile-up

Rescue workers remove Kristi Depew from her car at the intersection of Seth Childs Road and Claflin Road. She was involved in a three-car pileup around 2:20 p.m. Thursday. Depew hit the car of Mary Johnston, who was making a left-hand turn onto Claflin. The force of the collision caused Johnston's car to hit a third car. Depew and Johnston were treated for minor injuries and released from The Saint Mary Hospital.

Handicapped accessibility improves

By The Collegian Staff

Since 1980, when a program was started to remove barriers for the physically disabled, more than two-thirds of the buildings on campus have been made handicapped accessible.

"We are down to a handful of older buildings," said Gretchen Holden, director of services for students with physical limitations.

Helen Cooper, facilities planner for space management, said Seaton, Waters and Holton halls have been made totally accessible. Areas of Anderson, Kedzie, Calvin and Fairchild halls have also been made partially accessible.

Cooper said 68 percent of the total 52 administrative and academic buildings on campus are totally accessible, 28 percent are partially accessible and 4 percent are inaccessible.

In 1980, the University was allocated $300,000 to help meet the requirements of the Architectural Barriers Act, part of the 1973 Rehabilitation Act that mandated federally funded programs be made accessible for the physically disabled, Holden said.

To make the most of this limited amount of money, the University concentrated on providing access to buildings with programs and facilities that could not be moved, she said.

Lannie Zweimiller, chairman of the Coordinating Committee for Handicapped Services and director of Lafene Student Health Center, said the committee sets the agenda for removal of accessibility barriers on campus. He said three students, some with physical disabilities, are on the 15-member committee.

Committee member Tom Leikam, senior in advertising and president of Students for Handicapped Concerns, said the University is making progress to remove the accessibility barriers, but he is frustrated at the pace and lack of funding.

An architectural board reviews all new buildings or those that are renovated to ensure their accessibility, Holden said.

With the exception of Bramlage Coliseum, she said, "All the new buildings are beautiful."

One of the problems at Bramlage is that the ramps leading into the coliseum were designed at the minimum acceptable requirements set by the American National Standards Institute for physically disabled accessibility, Holden said. The ramps exhaust all but the strongest people in unmotorized wheelchairs.

She also said only a few signs are posted in the coliseum for the only elevator available for the physically disabled, and that those with disabilities are not allowed to sit in the tunnel area or on the floor during events.

In addition, she receives many complaints from visually-impaired people about the distance of the areas for the physically disabled in the upper-level concourse to the floor of the coliseum.

Leikam also complained about Bramlage seating.

"I go to basketball games with my friends, and I'm left sitting up at the top, away from the action," he said.

School cost could reach $17 million

By Lori Antrim
Staff Reporter

Members of the USD 383 Board of Education learned Monday it could cost district taxpayers $17 million to build a second middle school and to complete planned renovations of elementary schools.

During a meeting with the Ken Ebert Design Group, architects unveiled several design options for the middle school and plans for additions or modifications to elementary schools.

The board first began discussing ways to deal with already crowded schools in the fall 1987. A core committee made up of members of the community and school officials recommended the district consider building a second middle school to alleviate overcrowded classrooms.

Plans for the second middle school, which will house grades six and seven, was the major topic of discussion during the meeting Monday. The estimated construction cost to build the middle school is $11.5 million. However, this figure does not include furnishings, equipment, faculty and operating costs for the facility.

During their presentation, the architects introduced four floor plans for the middle school. Each of the proposed plans features a cluster concept, designed to create a school-within-a-school type atmosphere.

The architects also unveiled several options the board of education could adopt concerning elementary school renovations. Proposed renova-

State budget cuts cause hiring freeze for campus police

By Gregory A. Branson
Collegian Reporter

Hiring by the K-State Police Department has been frozen indefinitely because of recent state budget problems.

Charles Beckom, chief of police, said he was informed on Jan. 12, that the police department was included in a statewide hiring freeze.

The freeze leaves the department two officers short, and possibly three officers short by the end of February, Beckom said.

The department has 19 officers and two vacancies. Another officer is planning to leave on Feb. 18.

"These vacancies were in the process of being filled when the freeze hit," Beckom said. "We won't get to fill these vacancies until the freeze is lifted."

The safety of the campus shouldn't be affected by the loss of manpower, said John Lambert, director of public safety.

The loss of manpower will mean extra work for the officers still working for the department, especially with the increase in student population.

"If the freeze lasts from six months to a year, then we might have some problems," Lambert said.

Even before the vacancies, the police department was busy.

"We average one call every three minutes," Beckom said. "There are times when we get a call requesting an officer for assistance every 45 seconds to every minute."

The December cold snap is a recent example of when the department was overrun with calls and didn't have enough officers to respond to them. Calls ranged from students who couldn't get their cars started to people with cars that stalled in the middle of a street on campus, Beckom said.

"We had people that waited three or four hours to get into their car because they had locked their keys inside," Beckom said.

Campus police are also tied up with investigative responsibilities.

"We have 2,000 to 2,800 criminal and non-criminal investigations a year," Beckom said.

He said two hours is the average time it takes for an officer to go out and take a report.

"That doesn't include the time it takes to type the report and get it ready for a court presentation or to send it off to whomever needs it," he said.

One of the main responsibilities of the campus police is safety at events such as Landon Lectures, football and basketball games. Extra officers are brought in on overtime status to supplement the regular number of officers on duty.

The number of additional officers brought in ranges from four officers to all the officers in the department.

"For football games, we bring in every officer," Beckom said.

The extra officers brought in for sports events are paid by the KSU Athletic Department, he said. For other events, such as Landon Lectures, the police department has to absorb the cost.

Department equipment is paid out of the Other Operating Expense fund, Beckom said. This year's OOE fund is about $25,000, out of which everything from pencils and paper to patrol cars, gas, and oil must be paid.

"The $25,000 is a very thin budget that we have to live on," Beckom said. "We live like a lot of other departments with limited budgets on campus."

The department is in the process of replacing three of its patrol cars. The cost for two of the vehicles must be paid out of the OOE funds, Lambert said.

'Mistake' corrected Governor requests budget amendment

By Steve Franzen
Staff Reporter

Gov. Mike Hayden will submit a budget amendment to the Legislature today, asking for $846,000 for K-State.

In the governor's Budget Amendment, Hayden adds $346,000 to K-State's budget for the funding of the longevity bonuses for University classified staff members. He also adds $500,000 for the proposed additions to Throckmorton Hall.

"When the governor makes budget amendments, that sends a green light to people. It sends a strong message to the Legislature that he wants those things accomplished," said Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan.

The addition of longevity funding will pay the bonuses of classified University employees. The program pays a bonus to employees that have been at the University for 10 years or more. Bonuses increase with each extra year the employee remains on payroll and range from $400 to $1,000.

The legislation for this program was passed in 1989, and the state is still in the first fiscal year of the program.

The other $500,000 in funds will be used to start the Plant Science building. This money was needed to secure the funds already appropriated by the federal government. This will also move the state closer to fulfilling its half of the $27 million commitment with the federal government. The state is participating in a fund-matching program to build the additions on Throckmorton.

The funding for the longevity bonus program was left off Hayden's initial budget due to an error in paperwork on K-State's part, said Sue Peterson, assistant to the president.

"The payment of bonuses was never at risk. The problem was finding the money if it was not funded," said John Struve, director of the budget office. "We would have had to pick it up through a number of means."

The funds for the Plant Science building were also not in the budget due to the cuts in the State Education Building Fund. The money cut from this fund was transferred to maintenance of existing structures.

"Many people in the state were enthusiastic about this, and he (Hayden) found a way to do it," said President Jon Wefald about the absence of funding for the Plant

State money needed for K-State to keep federal matching funds

By Steve Franzen

The University will come one step closer to securing the Throckmorton additions when Gov. Mike Hayden submits a budget amendment to the Legislature today, adding $500,000 for the proposed Plant Science building.

"This is the governor's way of making additional budget recommendations in a formal way," said Sue Peterson, assistant to the president.

If the federal money already allocated for Throckmorton Hall is not matched by the state, the funds will have to be returned.

"Ultimately, we could lose them," said Lawrence Garvin, director of facilities planning.

In the funding program, the state and the federal government have agreed to match each other's commitment of $13.5 million by 1991. To date, the federal government has appropriated about $4.3 million, and the state has appropriated about $1.3 million.

Vincent Cool, associate director of facilities planning, said the state has been asked to appropriate $500,000 this year, and then follow a multi-year appropriation plan. This allows for the completion of planning without all the money in hand. Cool said a multi-year plan will show good faith and encourage the federal government to match its half of the commitment.

However, Hayden has recommended that $10 million be cut from the state's Education Building Fund, which is used to construct new buildings.

Cool said a cut in the state building fund does not mean that the funds would not be appropriated. He said the funds could come from other sources in the state government.

The addition plans will remain on the table until the total $27 million is appropriated, which Cool anticipates should be by March 1991. At that time, the estimated 30 months of construction may begin.

The additions to the present structure are still on the drawing table, but are expected to be finished by March 1991. Horst, Terril & Karst, an architecture firm in

Castro claims 'Yankee attack'

MEXICO CITY (AP) — Fidel Castro greeted the crew of a freighter fired upon by the U.S. Coast Guard when they arrived Thursday in Havana, praising their courage in the face of a "Yankee attack," the official Cuban news agency said.

Prensa Latina said the Cuban president met the crew of the freighter Hermann at the stairs of the plane that brought them home Thursday afternoon from the Mexican port of Tampico.

The news agency said the crew was then taken to downtown Havana, where "hundreds of thousands of people had gathered" in tribute to them near the U.S. interest section, which handles U.S. diplomatic affairs in Cuba.

A U.S. Coast Guard cutter opened fire on the Hermann with a machine gun and cannon after the freighter repeatedly refused to stop and be searched for drugs. The Hermann was escorted to Tampico Wednesday by the Mexican Navy and searched by Mexican officials, who said they found no drugs.

Cuba has filed a protest with the United States over the incident, which took place as the freighter crossed the Gulf of Mexico between Cuba and Mexico.

"This deed demonstrates once more that the United States intends to behave as owner of the world and with its proverbial barbarism appears willing to obstruct normal commerce between Cuba and Mexico," a Cuban official in Washington said, according to Prensa Latina.

Fetal brain tissue grafted

WASHINGTON (AP) — Brain tissue transplanted from an aborted fetus into the brain of a man with severe Parkinson's disease resulted in marked improvement in the patient's condition and tests show the grafted tissue is still growing, European researchers report in a study published Friday.

The researchers report in Science magazine that the transplanted fetal brain tissue apparently thrived and is producing dopamine, a brain chemical that is essential for normal controlled muscle movements.

Olle Lindvall of the University Hospital in Lund, Sweden, chief author of the report, told The Washington Post that the study, involving a single patient, "is very exciting and promising news," but he cautioned that the study "does not prove that we can get this effect in other patients or sustain it in this one."

Parkinson's disease occurs when areas of the brain degenerate and stop producing dopamine, a neurotransmitter essential for carrying signals from one part of the brain to another. By transplanting fetal brain tissue into the affected area, researchers hope to restore the production of dopamine.

Minister, boy die in accident

HUTCHINSON (AP) — A Hutchinson minister and a small boy were killed Thursday in a crash on an icy bridge west of Hutchinson.

The Rev. Mark Emel, 35, and Ronnie Mehl, 3, were killed late Thursday morning when the pickup Emel was driving skidded out of control on a Kansas 96 bridge and collided with an oncoming car.

Emel, pastor of Christ Lutheran Church in Hutchinson, was taking the child home from a pre-school.

Cigarette tax endorsed

TOPEKA (AP) — Smokers would pay more to finance higher education under a bill endorsed by a Senate committee today.

The Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee endorsed on a voice vote a measure that would increase the state tax on a package of cigarettes by 5 cents and on other tobacco products by 5 percent. The money would be used to finance programs at the six state universities.

Sen. Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, introduced the bill to finance the third year of the Margin of Excellence program, which increases salaries for faculty members at state universities.

Sen. Phil Martin, D-Pittsburg, moved to change the bill so the money would not be earmarked for the Margin.

Senate changes SGA rules

Student Senate passed unanimously several bills dealing with wording changes in the Senate By-Laws, Standing Rules and the Student Governing Association Constitution.

The constitution was changed to prevent potential candidates who are planning to leave the University from running for office. The change also took out a prohibition preventing graduate students from serving on the Board of Student Publications.

Also approved were the appointments of Amy Moats, freshman in business, as coordinator for personnel selections, and Deborah Seibold, junior in pre-law, as Senate intern coordinator.

Changes were made in the Athletic Ticket Sales Committee selection process. The changes call for the Student Senate chairman, vice chairman and personnel selections coordinator to select the committee, subject to Senate approval.

Senate approved a resolution commending Mary Hale, senior in history and speech, and Janelle Larson, senior in animal sciences and industry and social sciences, for winning Rhodes Scholarships.

Acker appointed to post

WASHINGTON (AP) — Duane Acker, former University president, has been appointed to a top administrative post with the Agriculture Department, it was announced Thursday.

Acker will leave Manhattan and start next week as administrator of USDA's Office of International Cooperation and Development, which handles international training and technical assistance programs and overseas research projects.

Colleagues and faculty members will pick up the international agriculture and nutrition courses he currently teaches in the College of Agriculture. Acker said he wishes he could still teach at the University.

"It's something I'll regret having to leave," he said. White House officials had been talking to him for a while, he said.

"I'm looking forward to it; it will be quite a challenge," Acker said.

Acker left the University in 1986 for a post with the U.S. Agency for International Development and most recently has served as the agency's assistant to the administrator for food and agriculture.

Agriculture Secretary Clayton Yeutter announced the appointment, saying Acker was "uniquely qualified" for his new position because of his experience with AID and agriculture.

Before becoming president of the University in 1975, Acker was dean of agriculture and director of the agricultural experiment station at South Dakota State University.

City, residents consult on land

By Tomari Guinn
Staff Reporter

Four alternative Manhattan land use plans were discussed by city officials Thursday during an informational meeting to gain public input into the various concepts.

The consulting firm of Howard, Needles, Tammen and Bergendoff developed the plans with the help of several city planning committees.

These committees, made up of city staff and residents, include the Department of Community Development, a Policy Advisory Committee, a Technical Advisory Committee and a Citizen Advisory Committee.

Ed Schippmann, a consultant for HNTB, said the alternative concepts were created to encourage discussion among city officials.

"We tried to develop the concepts to meet the goals and objectives of the community while maintaining the character of the city," Schippmann said.

The objective for the planning meetings is to gain a consensus of what features the future land use plan should include for the city's growth patterns of the next 20 years, he said.

When a final plan is chosen by the committees, Schippmann said, it will not likely be any one of the alternatives, but a combination of the four.

"All of the plans have consequences — pros and cons," he said.

"The best features from each of the plans will be combined, and we may come up with a new plan altogether."

The current stage of the study, or Phase II, was scheduled to have concluded in mid-January, but is about three to four weeks behind, Schippmann said.

Phase III will begin in mid-February and will include preliminary land use and utility plans. The final land use and utility plan will be completed by the middle or end of June.

Phase II planning will focus on the growth parameters for the city, Schippmann said. Fine tuning for the inner city will occur in Phase III.

The four proposals include several common characteristics:

■ Building a new, widened bridge crossing of the Kansas River along Kansas Route K-177.

■ Extending and improving Kimball Avenue to Fort Riley Boulevard.

■ Prohibiting major urban development in designated flood plains.

■ Preserving and protecting areas of significant slopes and natural habitat.

■ Maintaining open space or sufficient building setbacks along the banks of the Kansas and Big Blue rivers.

Friday-night buffet offers seafood dishes

Jim Rourke

Arts/Entertainment Editor

Frog legs are tasty.

The University Inn, just across the street from campus, has a tradition of serving Friday evening seafood buffets.

This buffet is in the University Club and is an all-you-can-eat affair.

The buffet begins with a salad. The salad servings include a couple of tasty cheeses, in the form of cheese cubes cut in bite-size pieces. All too many buffets serve cheese that serves as a facsimile of wax or chewable plastic, but the cheese on the buffet is sharp, tangy and delicious.

The salad dishes include different fruits. There were kiwi slices the night we were there. There are different mixed salads and the standard lettuce bowl and dressings.

Their clam chowder was hot, full bodied and had lots of meaty chunks of clams.

When you finish with the salad and the clam chowder, the entrees can start with frog legs. The evening we ate at the buffet, the frog legs were in a tomato-based sauce that was fairly good. Frog legs are at their best when broiled with a light sauce. The legs are a little heavier than rattlesnake meat or chicken.

The crab legs were plentiful, with appliances to use for cracking the shell and retrieving the meat.

This buffet cost $14, without drinks.

The University Inn's traditional seafood buffet earns this reviewer's seal of approval.

Teams learn body functions

Donated biology cadavers provide hands-on experience

By Ingrid Erickson
Collegian Reporter

Students in one of K-State's biology courses have an opportunity to work on cadaver teams, a program offered to undergraduates in only 5 percent of the nation's universities.

Cadavers, preserved human corpses, are dissected in Structure and Function of the Human Body.

"It's like hands-on training for anybody that has an interest in the human body. Working with the cadavers is a learning experience that you don't have in most classes," said

Kathy Linenberger, senior in pre-medicine.

Cadavers have been a part of the K-State biology department since the early 1970s. Dr. Herschel Gier, now deceased, wanted undergraduate students, particularly those interested in physical therapy, to have an opportunity to see how the body functions, said Ann Smith, assistant professor of biology.

Smith came to the University in 1970. In 1974, she established the Human Body class to combine anatomy and physiology courses into one six-hour class.

"Occasionally a student will find working with the cadavers upsetting, but most students find it very helpful," Smith said. "Those that complete the semester have a positive feeling."

Of the 166 students enrolled in Human Body, about 45 apply to be on a cadaver team. Thirty students are selected. Three teams, each consisting of 10 students, are formed.

Cadaver teams spend four hours in class with their instructor studying body parts, then teach the human body labs under the guidance of their instructors.

Students majoring in physical education, foods and nutrition, dietetics, speech pathology and biology all make up cadaver teams, Smith said. About one-third of the students eventually apply to nursing, dental and medical schools.

Three cadavers are on loan to the University for one year from the University of Kansas School of Medicine. Each semester the department receives two new cadavers. The department pays a cost of $350 per cadaver to cover shipping costs.

Is 'Night of the Living Deans' a reality?

I was sitting in the Gothic Room in Farrell Library reading Jonathan Swift's "A Modest Proposal," when Bart Bryce came running up to me and sat down. He was looking rather pale. "It's horrible, D.L.," he said. "Terrifyingly horrible."

I leaned back in my chair and crossed my arms. "Okay, Bart, shoot."

"That's exactly what I've come to talk to you about, D.L. I think I've discovered the administration's secret solution to all of K-State's financial problems."

"What is it, Bart?"

Bart looked around the room and leaned closer to me. "They let it slip last week during the Student Senate meeting." His voice fell to a whisper.

"You mean that comment about the two professors dying and helping them balance the budget? That was only a joke, Bart, a morbid one yes, but only a joke."

"No," Bart shook his head. "They want us to think it was a joke. To hide the real truth. But that comment has to mean something."

"And it means what? What's the real truth?"

"They're killing off professors."

"Why?"

"As a cost-cutting measure, D.L. Why else?"

"Instead of firing them and violating their tenure?"

"Yes, that's part of it. The administration is eliminating professors when it needs money."

"Sort of trimming the fat so to speak, huh, Bart? Sort of a 'Night of the Living Deans'?"

"You laugh now, D.L., but think about it, what are the odds of two professors, whose combined salaries add up to $60,000, dying just when one of the colleges needed to pay back $60,000. I didn't know it was possible for two professors' salaries at K-State to even add up to that much."

"It happens sometimes," I said.

"And when it happens, the administration does something about it."

I nodded. "And maybe some of the mass firings which are occurring this year are actually part of the cover up."

"Of course they are!" Bart yelled, jumping up. He quickly scanned the room and sat back down. "Now you're beginning to see the truth."

Dwayne Lively

Collegian Columnist

"But, Bart, as long as it's just professors who are being forced to make 'the ultimate sacrifice' why should we students care?"

Bart's voice became almost inaudible as he began to tremble. "Because we're next, D.L. They'll come after the students next."

"All 16,000 plus of us?"

"Yes."

"How?"

Bart looked around the room again. "It'll start with selective admissions. Anyone who isn't 'qualified' to go to a regent's school will be put on a farm and fattened up to be served in Derby and Kramer food centers."

"What would that accomplish?" I asked.

"They wouldn't have to buy any food. Think of all the money that would save them. All that extra money could be sent back to the administration where they could hire even more associate deans and associate vice presidents than they have now."

"How many do they have?"

"No one knows for sure, D.L. We're not even sure what they all do. But I'll bet one of them is in charge of food acquisition," Bart winked. "If you get my drift."

"I get it. Is that all they're planning?"

"No. The next part of the plot involves the Wildcat Card. It will be used to screen people coming in and out of the library. In order to go in you will have to insert your card into the gate. If you try to use the library more times than you're allowed, you'll be dropped down a chute into a food processing area. We won't be told what the maximum number of visits allowed is, and each of us will have a different quota, so we won't go very often. Since we'll never use the library's resources, we won't complain about a lack of them."

"What about English majors, Bart?" I asked. "They use the library quite a bit. Won't that affect their ability to earn their degree?"

Bart shook his head. "You're so naive, D.L. The Board of Regents is in on it as well. They're pushing for closed admissions and they've already eliminated the Ph.D. in English here and a bunch of professors are 'retiring.' It's only a matter of time before they eliminate the M.A. program and all the English undergraduates. You see, if you eliminate the demand on the library, you eliminate the need to make the library better. ... Actually that's not a bad idea. I guess I'll give them that one."

"All right, Bart, I'll grant you all of the above, but who's the mastermind behind all this? Someone has to be in charge."

Bart looked over his shoulder and under the table then leaned over and whispered directly into my ear.

"Zsa Zsa Gabor."

Money from cigarette tax would aid schools

The Kansas legislature is debating whether to place a five-cent tax on packs of cigarettes sold in Kansas. We hope the bill will pass because increased cost may help smokers quit and discourage others from starting to smoke.

As well, the aptly termed "Smokers for Excellence Bill" earmarks money from the cigarette tax to fund the Margin of Excellence. If passed, the MOE would receive an estimated $20 million per year.

K-State would be able to hire more teachers, house homeless freshmen, reinstate 24 lost courses, and perhaps buy a real library. Luckily for K-State students, few heed the Surgeon General's warning on cigarette labels. However, the number of education-defeating public service announcements and Heart and Lung Association campaigns continues to rise, so smokers are bound to quit sometime. If Kansans all quit smoking, the MOE would lose money and Kansas universities would again suffer financially.

To avoid that end, perhaps K-State should remove no-smoking signs from campus. Educate students and faculty on the new financial benefits of smoking.

But the MOE still faces the possibility that Kansas smokers will eventually contract lung cancer and die, leaving the MOE penniless again.

It seems wiser to fund public service announcements with cigarette tax money, and fund the MOE with a more stable source of income. However, as "beggars cannot be choosers," we will accept any money we can get, and accept the new meaning of the phrase, "to die for your school."

Article clarified

Editor,

In the Collegian of Tuesday, Jan. 30, the article on page 7 by Shannan Seely, which is otherwise excellent, contains one mistake.

The Smith Scholarship House is governed by the Smith Alumni Association, not the KSU Alumni Association. Contributions to the Smith Scholarship House are handled by the KSU Foundation.

Qualified students are referred to the Smith Scholarship House by the KSU Housing Department.

Poor planning

Editor,

For the past several weeks, the sidewalk outside Nichols Hall next to Mid Campus Drive has slowly been replaced. When construction started, I assumed the goal was to improve access to our campus. To my surprise, a few days ago, I discovered this was untrue. The sidewalk was indeed replaced, but the curbs still remained inaccessible to the handicapped.

K-State claims to have a stated policy of non-discrimination. This policy includes the handicapped. Apparently, whoever designed the sidewalk was ignorant of this policy or decided to ignore it.

It is true that handicapped persons may reach all the buildings in the vicinity by other means. The point is, they should not have to. Also, if the sidewalk truly had to be replaced, why weren't the curbs automatically improved?

LETTERS

This may only be a minor problem to the University, but not to me. I feel it is a sign of poor planning and a callous attitude. It angers me that in trying to improve the situation, the University ignored the problem. The entire University setting should be made available to all students, not just to special sections.

Jonathan Mertz
graduate in speech

Good column

Editor,

Congratulations, Brad, on a column worth reading. Euthanasia is an increasingly important topic as medicine enables us to prolong life when living has stopped. Like abortion, the grey area involved is large, too large for many people to have any common ground.

Your examples, though, touch on one problem of euthanasia (and there are many others). Who decides when a person should die? While I believe those stricken with chronic, agonizing, terminal diseases — those for whom all other chances have been tried without success — should be able to choose to die, there must be criteria which are met.

Sweden allows euthanasia if the person requests it on several occasions. This request must be made to at least two different people (doctors), and several other points are made. This assures no family member, doctor, or other person ends another's life without their consent, as well as assuring the individual is aware of the gravity of the choice being made.

Such distinctions create problems in the Cruzan case. In short, if she cannot say she is in pain or wants to die, what right do doctors, lawyers, parents or friends have to make a life-ending decision, especially when euthanasia is illegal in the United States. There should be no cause for suit in the parents' attempts to starve their daughter.

Thank you, though, for writing a column that looks at one of the problems facing our world rather than the pointless opinions we have seen in earlier work.

Kyle A. Miller
senior in premed/life sciences

Support helpful

Editor,

As co-chairs of the Essential Edge Campaign for the K-State Libraries, we wish to commend those students who participated in the sit-in last week at Farrell Library. By so doing, attention was called to the needs of Farrell Library in a unique and effective way.

The Essential Edge Campaign for the K-State Libraries has a committee of 18 persons committed to helping reach the $3-million goal. They have been contacting potential donors and soliciting pledges. Three million dollars is a large amount to raise, particularly when the library has no constituency and there has been no established pattern of giving to the library.

We are grateful for the assistance of SHELF and the media coverage generated by the sit-in. We look forward to working with the students to gain funding for the library.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN VIRTUOSO

Heading West with Quilters

Their experience in dancing, singing, acting, directing and producing includes hundreds of shows, spanning the years in countries across the globe.

The Opening Night Musical Theatre Company, a professional theater troupe, is preparing for its return performance of "Quilters," scheduled for 8 p.m., today and Saturday and 2 p.m. Sunday at the Wareham Opera House. Since this is a dinner theater, dinner starts at 6:30 p.m. today and Saturday and 12:30 p.m. Sunday.

When considering each cast member's background, it's easy to forget this is Manhattan, Kan., and not New York, N.Y.

"This is the most professional cast I've ever had," said Linda Haynes Uthoff, the troupe's artistic director. "Everyone has a professional background, and they're wonderful to work with."

Both Linda and her husband, John Uthoff, associate professor of speech, have performed professionally. Linda worked on the stage, while John spent time behind the scenes working with lighting and design.

Director Edith Hinrichs was a professional dancer in New York City before moving to Manhattan. She has since taught and directed shows for the University. Musical director Don Livingston, a 1989 graduate in music, also performs in the orchestra.

Add a supporting cast with a variety of degrees and experience in theatre and music performance, and the end result is the only touring musical company in Kansas.

The show returned in response to demand, Uthoff said, after sold-out shows in August. Sponsored in part by the Kansas Art Commission, Thursday's date kicked off a spring tour after a month's rest over the Christmas season.

Despite months of performance, practice is still necessary before opening night, Hinrichs said.

"We've got to bring it back to the level it was before," she said. "After a layoff, people forget things. The timing has to be just right, and it takes three or four rehearsals to get it back."

However, motivation to begin a second tour won't be a problem, Hinrichs said.

In fact, cast member Julie Davenport said she looks forward to returning to the stage.

"It was so much fun to see each other for the first time after the break," Davenport said.

"We're really kind of a family now, and performing the show is like a coming home."

Although everyone involved in the production has outside jobs, the company tours all across the state.

Uthoff said the smaller communities are especially receptive to the musical, mostly due to its content. The musical involves a group of pioneer women recollecting past events as they quilt. Each story vividly describes life on the plains as an original settler.

She said most of the performances in small towns are accompanied by community quilt shows, and occasionally audience members attend dressed in historical clothing.

"The small-town audiences make us feel very welcome and are very appreciative of us," Uthoff said.

"Quilters" will be a dinner theater presentation, featuring a western-style buffet.

Club at elementary school teaches about drug abuse

By Samantha Farr
Collegian Reporter

Students at Lee Elementary School are doing their part in helping others stay drug free, and have started a program on drug education.

Cindy Lehr, sixth-grader at Lee, summed up her reasons for joining the school's new Just Say No Club.

"I came to the meeting because I thought it would be helpful," Lehr said. "So, if I was ever confronted with drugs, I would know how to say no."

Marsha Ward, elementary prevention coordinator, said Lee formed the club for all of the elementary students.

Money for the club was received from the school's self-esteem fund, which came from a grant given by the district.

"We let (students) brainstorm and come up with their own ideas," Ward said. "Then they're more interested in what they're doing."

She said the club will print a newsletter for parents in March and May. Members will have the chance to write articles and submit ideas for the newsletter.

"We wanted the newsletter for self-esteem," Ward said. "We wanted something open for all ages."

The club helps students know more about drugs and what they can do to users, said Jan Gibbs, a fifth- and sixth-grade teacher who helped organize the club.

"We want to help the children feel good about themselves," Gibbs said. "I think of the club as a support group."

She said the staff from Lee first thought of forming the club while attending a convention for Kansas schools.

"We went to the 'Toward a Drug Free Kansas' convention, where we had a week's training," Gibbs said. "We learned how to work better with kids, and we did a lot of upbeat things to get us excited about ourselves and working with others."

"You can learn new ways to say no to drugs," said Darren Goddard, a fourth-grader. "I want to help people say no."

"Building confidence and trust between each other helps you feel good about yourself," Gibbs said. "We want the students to feel that they're number one and they're OK."

Telefund requests donations; phone volunteers call alumni

By Tammy Breitenbach
Collegian Reporter

More than 1,200 student and faculty volunteers will be keeping the phone lines busy at the Union this month during the 1990 KSU Foundation Telefund.

Telefund is an annual fund raiser in which volunteers from each college request pledges from alumni nationwide, said Gordon Dowell, director of publications for the Foundation.

About 16,000 alumni pledge each year, Dowell said.

"Last year, Telefund raised a record $587,734," he said. "Since 1985, the annual phone campaign has raised nearly $2.5 million for scholarships and other educational enhancements. The ongoing goal for each year is to raise at least as much money, and hopefully more than the previous year."

Telefund makes a tremendous impact on the alumni giving program, said Art Loub, president of the Foundation.

"It is primarily due to Telefund that Kansas State has the highest percentage of alumni support in the Big Eight," Loub said. "The alumni really appreciate speaking directly with the volunteer students and faculty callers," Loub said.

Rusty Andrews, director of annual giving, said many universities rely on paid callers or telemarketing firms to make alumni contact, but the University has retained its successful volunteer support.

"The students and faculty, with their enthusiastic support and dedication, have accepted this challenge and consistently make KSU the nation's premier volunteer phone campaign," Andrews said.

Donations made during Telefund will be managed by the Foundation, Dowell said. The Foundation is the fund-raising center of the University.

Dowell said setting up 60 phone lines is technical. Every line is plugged into a single cord running across the floor. The cord is hooked up to an existing phone line in the Union, he said.

After calling is over every evening, workers tear down the whole room, he said. This includes unhooking and boxing up all the phones and clearing everything out.

"A lot of people use the room, so we can't leave the phones set up over night," Dowell said.

A computer routes all calls and automatically selects the least expensive method of calling, he said. The bill is paid with money raised during the campaign.

In addition to alumni gifts, Telefund receives support from local businesses for the volunteers, said Beth Mennelle, assistant director of annual giving.

"This year, over $2,000 in prizes were donated to reward the most successful callers," Mennelle said.

Mennelle said a weekend getaway package from the Manhattan Holiday Inn is the prize for the most successful faculty volunteer.

Telefund begins Feb. 4 and continues each Sunday through Thursday during the month.

Few choose nursing

Students reluctant to enter profession

By Sandy Hegarty
Collegian Reporter

Nurses are becoming a rare commodity around the United States, and Kansas is no exception.

Students show a reluctance to enter nursing because of perceived low salaries and poor working conditions, said Phoebe Samelson, adviser for pre-nursing students and chairperson of the Economic and General Welfare Council of the Kansas State Nursing Association.

Samelson said nurses in large communities are paid more than nurses in rural communities, and nurses working in hospitals are paid more than nurses who work in nursing homes.

She said wages for nurses range from $7.25 per hour to $25.48 per hour. Years of experience in nursing and benefits packages also affect salaries, she said.

Salary improvements would help in recruitment. But issues such as recognition and autonomy for nurses are important in recruiting and retaining the best nurses, Samelson said.

"There's an awful lot of room at the top for a very articulate nurse, but there is also a need for bedside nurses," she said.

Employers are looking for well-prepared, baccalaureate-level nurses, she said.

Currently, 130 students are enrolled in the pre-nursing program.

Lafene Student Health Center has been affected by the nursing shortage. Lannie Zweimiller, Lafene director, said it is a situation of supply and demand.

In the early 1980s, hospitals moved to more out-patient care, Zweimiller said. The number of patients staying in hospitals decreased, so fewer nurses were needed. Many nurses were laid off. As a result, people stopped going to nursing school.

During the latter part of the 1980s, people began to require more hospital care, he said. The demand for nurses increased, but the supply of nurses was low. In addition, women are leaning away from nursing careers toward careers with higher salaries.

"There has been a tremendous increase in the utilization of services here (Lafene)," Zweimiller said. "This is probably due to enrollment increasing and because it's cheaper."

He said Lafene is required to find new nurses through state recruiting because it is a state-funded agency.

"We are handcuffed on what we can do about wages," Zweimiller said. "We can't compete with other health care facilities."

Because of the open positions, nurses at Lafene have had to work double shifts and overtime, he said.

The Saint Mary Hospital and Manhattan Memorial Hospital have not experienced as many problems with the shortage of nurses.

At the Saint Mary Hospital, there are shortages of nurses only in certain shifts and in some specialized areas, said Cathy Harnes, vice president of personnel and support services at the Saint Mary Hospital.

If you're looking for a career in engineering, consider

Cargill

Cargill is looking for chemical, mechanical, agricultural and milling-science engineers who are leaders interested in significant managerial jobs. We offer entry-level engineering positions that blend engineering expertise, production management and supervision.

Cargill is a privately held international agricultural marketing and industrial processing company. Our engineers become managers of production departments or engineering projects, with opportunities to become operations managers of production facilities. There is growth potential in a number of operating divisions for engineers with integrity, professionalism and creativity.

Cargill will be on campus:

- Feb. 15
Scott Montgomery will conduct on-campus interviews for milling-science majors.
- Feb. 21
Tony Lippert and Jeff Stanley will conduct on-campus interviews for all other engineering majors.

Superpower relations may improve

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Soviet Union is likely to pull all its troops from Europe by 1995, but the Western allies must remain wary of "the only nation on Earth capable of destroying the United States," Defense Secretary Dick Cheney told Congress on Thursday.

Cheney said President Bush's new proposal that Moscow and Washington seek agreement on deeper troop cuts in Europe than previously contemplated would "preserve ... a viable, useful" American military presence on the continent.

Bush in his State of the Union speech Wednesday proposed reducing U.S. and Soviet combat forces in Europe to no more than 225,000 for each side — a drop of 50,000 from the previous U.S. proposal at East-West troop reduction talks now under way in Vienna.

Bush said that with "communism crumbling" in Eastern Europe, the time had come to swiftly conclude agreements limiting conventional, strategic and chemical weapons.

In testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee, Cheney said "caution is still in order" in considering relaxing U.S. defenses, even though Moscow is reducing its military spending and is unlikely to initiate an attack on NATO territory.

"The Soviet Union remains the only nation on Earth capable of destroying the United States," Cheney said, adding that even if all Soviet troops leave Eastern Europe, Moscow would retain its geographic advantage in the event of a European crisis.

He said it was important not to drop below a certain troop level in Europe.

Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the ranking Republican on the committee, sought and received an assurance from Cheney that the administration would not consider going beyond Bush's latest troop-cut proposal in the foreseeable future.

"This is the worst possible time to contemplate changes in strategy," Warner said.

Cheney estimated that the 225,000 U.S. troop level in Europe could be achieved "within a year or two certainly" after an agreement is ratified. But he said the troops would be sent elsewhere and not removed from military service.

At the White House, Chief of Staff John Sununu said Bush's new troop-cut proposal was not intended to prop up a politically weakened Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev as he faces a critical meeting next week of the Communist Party Central Committee.

"If the cutting of troops would have been an advantage for Mr. Gorbachev, then Mr. Gorbachev would probably have announced them earlier himself, thereby getting both the advantage, the pressuring of the United States to do it and whatever international political benefits that come in that direction," Sununu said. "So that was not part of the consideration."

While acknowledging dramatic changes in the political landscape of Eastern Europe, Cheney said the Soviets are continuing to modernize their strategic nuclear arsenal and will be more capable in the 1990s to adapt new technologies to weapons systems.

Singles thrive with demise of albums

Mark Butler

Collegian Reviewer

In these final days of the vinyl record, the single, of all things, seems to be making a comeback of sorts. Although the physical structure has changed, the concept of the single is thriving.

The seven-inch slab of vinyl with a big hole in the middle has essentially disappeared. Now music buyers have two options to buy a handful of songs. Consumers have their choice of a twelve-inch vinyl record or a cassette single with a flimsy paper case. What really matters is the music though, and some of the best music is coming out on single only.

The ever-durable Duran Duran celebrated 10 years in the music business by releasing a greatest hits package aptly titled "Decade." Their new single, "Burning The Ground," oddly enough does not appear on that album. The track is a megamix of past Duran Duran hits reconstructed by studio engineers.

Parts of songs like "Save A Prayer" and "Rio" are juxtaposed on one another to interesting effect. While "Burning The Ground" is not on the "Decade" album, it is derived from most of the album's tracks.

Eddie Brickell and New Bohemians' cover of Bob Dylan's "A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall" is the first single from an otherwise undistinguished soundtrack. Consequently, one would be better off buying Brickell's single over the "Born on the Fourth of July" compilation. The song is ideal as a cover. The Dylan song retains its identity while being injected with the warmth and vitality of Brickell's voice. The song's subject matter couples memorably with the film it taken from.

The ever-miserable Morrissey returns to share his gloomy outlook with "Ouija Board, Ouija Board." The former singer with the Smiths has concentrated on releasing singles for the past year and a half, with uneven results.

His new song is definitely one of his worst attempts yet. The lyrics tread old ground of unhappiness and despair. The music itself is abysmal. "Ouija Board" is nearly tuneless. Morrissey needs a more creative and melodic songwriting partner to lighten up his negativity. Morrissey used to have a sense of humor as well. If he can remember that, then hopefully, "Ouija Board" can be overlooked.

In less than a year, England's Soul II Soul has made a tremendous impact on the American pop, dance and soul markets. "Keep On Movin'" and "Back To Life" broke new ground and managed to sell more than a million copies apiece. The songs brought emotion back to an often vapid musical scene. Two new singles manage to maintain those qualities.

The current American release, "Jazzie's Groove," is a vibrant funk instrumental. The track serves as a biography of sorts for the group by slipping in brief spoken recollections of leader Jazzie B. Unfortunately, as engaging as "Jazzie's Groove" is, it may be a little too offbeat for the American public.

The Grammy-nominated group's next single, "Get A Life," should remedy that situation upon its upcoming U.S. release. "Get A Life" builds upon the locomotion of "Jazzie's Groove," incorporating smoky vocals and a group of children chanting "What's the meaning of life?" The song is infectious and brimming with positivity and should reestablish Soul II Soul on the charts. Both of the group's singles are not available on album currently.

Another English group, the Chimes, are following in the footsteps of Soul II Soul and may beat them at their own game. "1-2-3" takes a big drum sound and fuses it to strings and gospel-tinged vocals. The result is reminiscent of classic seventies' soul like Marvin Gaye or Al

'Always' fails despite Hunter's performance

Richard Jones

Collegian Reviewer

I have a problem. I'm part reviewer and part human. The human part of me goes to see movies I expect to like, and usually do. This is not good for the reviewer part of me. After all, if I only see movies I know I'll like, then I'll only give good reviews. Such has been the case, until now.

Stephen Spielberg's "Always" is, in simple terms, bad. How could a movie starring Richard Dreyfuss, Holly Hunter, John Goodman and Audrey Hepburn possibly go wrong? Well, fortunately for me, I give reviews, not explanations. The difference is small, but distinct.

The collapse of this movie is in no way due to fault of talent. Holly Hunter is even more astonishing in "Always" than she has been in previous movies like "Broadcast News."

As the grieving girlfriend of a recently deceased fire-fighting pilot, Hunter manages to stir up the deepest sympathy for her character, Dorinda.

Dreyfuss is Pete, the doomed pilot. Even his performance is good enough to carry an ordinary movie. Unfortunately, "Always" has a lot to carry, and the burden is too much for even this highly talented cast to bear.

John Goodman plays the part of Al, Pete's friend and fellow firefighter. His character joins forces with Hunter's in an attempt to get Pete, who is a careless pilot, out of the sky and into an instructing position in Colorado.

Just as it seems their pleas have finally convinced Pete, he is called out to assist in another forest fire. Shortly after he saves Al's life, Pete's plane explodes in a ball of flames.

This is where Audrey Hepburn appears. Apparently, she has been sent from heaven to talk to Pete and give him a haircut, for unexplained reasons. Hap, as Hepburn's character is known, tells Pete that he is now, for lack of a better term, a guardian angel for a new young pilot-to-be.

Brad Johnson plays the part of Ted, the pilot to whom Pete has been assigned. No, the newcomer's acting abilities did not bring the film down. As a matter of fact, I expect to be seeing his name a lot more often.

Basically, Ted falls in love with Dorinda and just when it seems she is falling for him, Pete tries to bungle things up. As a dead person, he is able to see his friends, although they cannot see him. He is also able to speak to his friends, but everything he says appears in their heads as their own thoughts.

Pete uses his powers to remind his ex-girlfriend that, "You're still my girl."

As you might expect, Dorinda finds it increasingly more difficult to develop a relationship with Ted. With someone else talking in your head and reminding you that you're still committed, anyone would find this difficult.

Hollywood has been producing guardian angel movies since "It's a Wonderful Life" and probably before then as well. "Always" fails to add much to the general plot of such movies.

"Always" serves as excellent vehicles for Johnson and especially Hunter, to prove their skills, but the plot is so stale and basically unoriginal that it can be nothing more than an embarrassment in Hepburn's otherwise impressive list of film credits.

In short, Hepburn should've bowed out of the industry gracefully, like Elizabeth Taylor, for example. A film credit list as distinguished as Hepburn's is something to be proud of. "Always" leaves the viewer hoping that Hepburn will do at least one more movie. It would be unfortunate to end her career with this poorly developed film.

As an avid Holly Hunter fan, I have no regrets about seeing her latest accomplishment and recommend the same for any other of her fans. To get the most from this movie, buy your ticket knowing that you're there to see her powerfully touching scenes and nothing more. Higher expectations will only lead to disappointment.

Gown, ring styles vary for couples

By Heather Anderson
Collegian Reporter

As the end of the semester approaches, many K-State students will be faced with the ominous task of planning a wedding.

Future brides and grooms often want to know the latest styles in bridal and formal wear. From dresses to rings, new styles vary from elegant to elaborate but are consistently modern.

Bride and bridesmaid dresses are softer and simpler, said Christie Irish, owner of Christine's — The Wedding Company.

"It's not like a few years ago when the more ruffles you could stick on the dress, the better," Irish said. "Brides are going for a very contemporary, very stylish look, yet still soft and feminine."

A popular feature on many dresses is a shawl collar, which is off the shoulder, but with a wide band that extends around the shoulder and back, she said.

The mermaid dress, which is tightly fitted from the bodice to the knees, is also making a comeback, Irish said. The style is not as popular in the Midwest as it is elsewhere, however.

Although the new dresses are generally simpler, Irish said trains with lace and cutouts and accented headpieces are still popular.

For bridesmaids, new colors for spring include seafoam green, peach and pink. The dresses are styled similarly to the bride's but made in new fabrics like jacquard and ribbed taffeta.

Traditional tuxedos can be updated with brightly patterned cummerbunds and bow ties or lightly patterned fabric for the jacket and trousers.

"The guys who come in the store really know what they want," Irish said. "They are really going for the designer labels."

New styles are also appearing in rings. Bridal magazines stress textured bands, from nuggets to paisley prints.

Diamond Collection owner Sue Bath doesn't look for such dramatic styling to catch on in Manhattan, however.

Wedding cost minimal with careful planning

By Elvyn Jones
Collegian Reporter

If a couple can't afford a royal wedding like Chuck and Di but doesn't want to elope like Jack and Diane, there is a happy medium.

Karen Brown, manager of Arbuthnot's Hallmark, said it is most important to know the size of the guest list before ordering anything. Items such as invitations are cheaper when ordered in mass, and the price reverts back to the standard retail price if you need to reorder, she said.

Allowances should be made for possible mistakes. For example, Brown said $100 could be saved by ordering 200 simple invitations as opposed to the same number of elaborately cut-out invitations.

"Plain invitations are the most socially acceptable and the least expensive," said Tanya Bachamp, manager of Edeline's Weddings Plus.

Money can be saved by purchasing wedding books that include photograph albums, guest registers and gift registration, rather than buying individual books for each of these items, Brown said.

Cost can also be cut by reducing the size of the wedding party, by opting for a simpler wedding dress, by not having the father of the bride wear a tuxedo and by having the reception in a church basement as opposed to more expensive private halls, she said.

Bachamp said the bride willing to wear the dress of a friend or relative can save a great deal of money. She said she finds the idea of a bride wearing her mother's wedding dress appealing.

Rental cost can be cut by borrowing items such as serving sets from friends and relatives, Bachamp said.

Shower, wedding hints offered in bridal books

By Tomari Quinn
Staff Reporter

A bookstore just might be the best place for a bride to start planning the wedding of her dreams.

Books can take a wife-to-be from shower preparations to the honeymoon destinations, while helping to avoid embarrassing fashion or etiquette mistakes.

Kent Sylvis, Waldenbooks assistant manager, said the period of November through March is the planning stage for many June and July weddings.

"I'm sure there are a lot fewer weddings in the fall and winter because our sales of wedding books in the summer are really light," he said.

Sylvis said wedding books are currently being featured at Waldenbooks.

Ruth Sidhom, general book buyer at the K-State Union Bookstore, said buying trends tend to follow the school year and students planning around class schedules.

"A lot of the girls who come in tend to become engaged over Christmas break and come back to plan a summer wedding," she said.

Amy Reid, senior in speech pathology, is one student who is busy planning a June wedding.

"I'm discovering how much money a wedding takes and how hard it is to put one together," Reid said.

She said she tried to plan most of her wedding over Christmas break and used wedding books, with detailed checklists to help her get organized.

"I didn't realize how many minute details there would be," Reid said. "You need to buy special toasting glasses for the bride and groom and even a cake cutter. It's not just getting to the church on time."

Sylvis said "The Working Woman's Wedding Planner" by Susan

Tatsui-D'Arcy and "Planning a Wedding to Remember" by Beverly Clark are the two of the best sellers at Waldenbooks.

Bridal etiquette, groom guides, memory books and organized planners are just a few of the subjects approached in the dozen wedding books found in the Union Bookstore, Sidhom said.

"Our sales reflect not just student tastes, but also faculty, staff and customers attending meetings in the Union," Sidhom said.

She said name recognition has made "Dear Abby on Planning Your Wedding" by Abigail Van Buren one of the top sellers.

Other books available are "Can My Bridesmaids Wear Black and 325 Other Most Asked Etiquette Questions," by Marjabelle Young Stewart; "Bridal Shower Handbook," by Gail Greco; and "Newlyweds Guide to Sex on the First Night," by Richard Smith.

Couples split wedding expenses

By Shannan Seely
Collegian Reporter

In the past, a bride's family collected clothes and other items in a hope chest, or trousseau, while she was growing up to prepare for married life.

The tradition of a bride's family paying for the wedding has now been broken by using an agreeable budget, said Shelly Holle, manager of Christine's — The Wedding Company.

The bride's family would also host the wedding, paying for wedding invitations, thank-you notes, reception and wedding party expenses, bridal attendants' gifts, attendants' flowers, flower girl's flowers and the ceremony.

Although the bride usually buys the ring for the groom, tradition states church rental and all photography and videos costs are paid by the family of the bride, Holle said.

Traditionally, the groom's costs are minimal.

He is responsible for the marriage license, blood test, bride's ring, bouquet, mothers and grandmothers' corsages, attendants' gifts and flowers, clergyman fee and rehearsal dinner.

If liquor is planned at the reception, the groom is also responsible for liquor arrangements.

Optional costs for the couple include buying the formal wear for the wedding party and accommodations for guests, Holle said.

The first step is to agree on a wedding budget. Wedding planners can be purchased, which include a listing of expected costs, she said.

"Now, families need to sit down with the couple and say, 'This is how much money we can put in,' and the couple needs to respect that," Holle said.

"If one set of parents have many relatives they want to invite, you still need to work with the other family's finances," she said.

Brett retracts threat

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — George Brett says he was frustrated when he talked to a West Coast reporter about wanting more money from the Kansas City Royals and wishes he'd kept his mouth shut.

Brett, whose contract pays him a base salary of $1.5 million a year through 1991, with options for two more years after that, found himself at the center of controversy after his remarks were printed Tuesday by the Spokane, Wash., Spokesman-Review. He had been interviewed by Howie Stalwick last Friday while in Spokane on business, and admitted a lot of things were eating away at him.

"When I talked to that guy I was at that boiling point where everything is just blown so far out of proportion that I had to get it off my chest," Brett told The Kansas City Star in a telephone interview from his home in California Wednesday.

Among things aggravating him, Brett said, were not being invited back to the recent baseball dinner nor to participate in the annual fan caravan in which players tour the area to help drum up interest in the upcoming season.

"It was really strange," said Brett, who hit .282 with 10 homers and 80 RBI last year. "It was like, 'George, you've had a bad year from your standards. We don't want you to come to town.'"

"The longer I went without hearing from anybody, the more my mind was racing around 100 miles an hour, and I couldn't catch it," he said. "The more crazy thoughts, the more ugly thoughts were going through my mind. And I couldn't catch up with any of them."

Brett said that his phone had been ringing off the hook, and he could imagine the reaction of fans in Kansas City.

'Cats, 'Huskers look for win

Conference triumphs become more crucial

By David Svoboda
Sports Reporter

A pair of battered, bruised and recently beaten teams will square off Saturday afternoon in Lincoln, Neb.

When the ball goes up for the 3:10 p.m. tipoff in the Bob Devaney Sports Center, K-State and Nebraska will no doubt be ready to face a team that isn't from the state of Oklahoma.

Not to belittle the significance of the matchup between the Wildcats and the Cornhuskers, but after the shellackings both teams were dealt Wednesday by Oklahoma State and Oklahoma, respectively, each has to be breathing a sigh of relief.

Time for a chance to get back in the win column.

The visiting Wildcats, 12-9 overall and 2-3 in Big Eight play, are coming off an 89-67 drubbing in Stillwater. The Cowboys shot a blistering 67 percent from the field in handing the 'Cats their second consecutive double-figure defeat.

That second straight loss by 10 or more points was a rarity. K-State had not lost consecutive Big Eight games by 10 points or more since the 1985-86 team, coached by Jack Hartman, dropped a pair of road games against Kansas and Missouri. The Jayhawks and Tigers each scored 15-point wins over the 'Cats that year.

And while K-State may have been drubbed by the Cowboys, Nebraska (7-11, 0-5) was beaten senseless by Oklahoma in Norman. The ninth-ranked Sooners took their 41st straight win at home by 41 points, 105-64.

The margin of defeat was the worst in Big Eight play for Nebraska since Wilt Chamberlain scored 46 points in a 102-46 Kansas romp in Lawrence in 1958.

Can someone — anyone — please help stop the bleeding?

"It's not a fun experience at all," K-State coach Lon Kruger said of his team's pair of back-to-back batterings. "When that happens, you've got concern about a lot of different things."

Kruger said his team's mental state is a bit shaky at present.

"Right now, we're probably down as much as we've been this year in terms of confidence," Kruger said. "(The pair of losses were an) experience that hopefully we'll learn from and gain some confidence."

The K-State coach has to hope that confidence shows up quickly. Kruger admitted that here, in game six of a 14-game league schedule, is a "must" win opportunity staring his team in the face.

"Is this a must game relative to our NCAA hopes? You could probably look at it that way," Kruger said. "Teams that can finish in the top division of the Big Eight Conference will likely get bids. Whoever can slip into that 4th spot (along with Missouri, Kansas and Oklahoma) will probably be assured of a bid."

The prospect of getting well in Lincoln is about a 50-50 proposition. Nebraska leads the series in games

basketball coach

played at the Devaney Center 8-6. The Wildcats, however, have won the last two games played in an arena adorned in the same amount of red as Bramlage Coliseum is in purple.

The 'Huskers are led by 7-foot-2 center Rich King. The junior center from Omaha, Neb., was scoring at a 17.6-point-per-game clip prior to the loss against Oklahoma.

A sophomore, junior and senior join King as double figure scorers for Nebraska. Carl Hayes, Clifford Scales and Ray Richardson join King in giving Nebraska four scoring threats. Hayes had 15 in the loss to Oklahoma Wednesday.

K-State, on the other hand, counters with but two double-figure scorers — Steve Henson and Jean Derouillere. Derouillere was the leading 'Cat scorer in the loss at Oklahoma State with 16. Henson had 18 and 25 points in the two games between the teams last season, both K-State wins.

Oliver Kaubisch/Staff

Jeff Wires, who has come off the bench in recent games to help spark the Wildcats' cause, will be hoping to help rectify K-State's recent problems in a 3:10 p.m. matchup in Lincoln Saturday against the 'Huskers.

Tough challenge awaits tracksters

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

In search of the best possible competition for his squads in preparation for the Big Eight Indoor Championships Feb. 23-24, K-State track coach John Capriotti will take his team to Champaign, Ill., for the Illini Classic Saturday.

Playing host to the four-team meet will be the Big Ten's defending champ, Illinois, while Wisconsin and Big Eight foe Iowa State, will join the Wildcat men and women in the competition.

"Illinois is the defending Big Ten champion for two or three years in a row," Capriotti said, "and Wisconsin is always very good, so it will be a very competitive meet."

K-State has competed in two meets so far this season, winning a triangular from Kansas and Missouri last weekend, and having qualified two athletes for the NCAA Indoor Championships March 9-10 at Indianapolis.

Shot putter Angie Miller and triple jumper Carla Shannon both qualified for nationals in the first competition of the season. Miller had a toss of 52-8 1/4 in her event, while Shannon met the qualifying mark with a leap of 41-2 1/4 in the triple jump.

Capriotti said there have been some surprising performances from the K-State women so far in the young season.

"We've had a lot of surprises. Angie Miller, although it's not a surprise because she's a good thrower, has been very consistent for us," Capriotti said. "And Connie Teaberry is jumping very well, much better than she was at this time last year."

"And I've been very happy with our women's distance runners, Janet Treiber, Paulette Staats, Janet Haskin, and Angie Barry, those four have been doing a nice job for us."

Teaberry, is on the verge of becoming a national qualifier in the high jump. Her 5-10 1/4 effort has given her a provisional qualifying mark, and she could make the field if the NCAA needs more competitors.

The distance runners Capriotti mentioned are eyeing a sweep in the Big Eight mile honor roll. Staats (4:57.88) is in third place on the conference honor roll while Treiber (4:59.27), Haskin (4:59.70), and Barry (5:01.04) are sitting in fourth through sixth place.

Also ranking high on the honor roll for the K-State women are Markeya Jones, who is second in the 200 meters at 24.7; Joy Jones, third in the 400 at 56.34; Ellarie Pesmark, second in the 600-yard run at 1:25.54; Haskin, first in the 3,000 meters at 9:36.74; and Shannon, third in the long jump at 18-4 1/4.

K-State has also had some bright performances from its men's side. Capriotti said he has been especially pleased with Charles Armstead in the hurdles and long jump.

"Charles Armstead has done a very good job for us," he said. "And Thomas Randolph has done a nice job for a freshman and so have Dwayne Murphy and Orlo Berry in the triple jump."

On the Big Eight charts, Armstead ranks third in the 55-meter hurdles with a time of 7.38, and second in the long jump at 25-4 1/4. His long jump mark is an NCAA provisional qualifier.

Also ranking in the top three on the Big Eight honor roll for the K-State men are Tyrone Watkins, third in the 400 at 48.50; David Warders, third in the 3,000 at 8:17.16; R.D. Cogswell, third in the high jump at 6-10 1/4; and Murphy, third in the triple jump at 49-6 1/4.

Tennis squad to open season

Bietau to evaluate team

By Dan Wicker
Sports Reporter

Being relaxed and having a break is always nice, but there is always the time when the season rolls around, and the team has to start going again.

That is the boat that the tennis team is in as it swings back into the action tonight and Saturday in Ahearn Field House for two early-season meets with Creighton and Southwest Missouri State.

K-State will play host to Creighton at 6:30 p.m. today and Southwest Missouri at 6:30 p.m. Saturday.

The meet will be used as a determining tool for Bietau to determine where the team stand right now, and for what they need to do to improve.

"The meet is to assess where we are and to begin to make progress for some goals we have set for spring," Bietau said. "I will know more, after next week, because of the length of the season. We have only been going for about ten days."

Although the Wildcat netters are using the meet to just get their season going, they are still not taking it lightly, and the squad wants to capture an opening-season victory.

"They are not two of the stronger teams (K-State will face), however, we can't afford to and won't be taking them lightly," Bietau said. "Southwest Missouri has had their share of success against us."

Another reason for the teams' desire to win is that all meets are important according to Bietau, because both Creighton and Southwest Missouri are in the same region as the Wildcat women, and victories would count toward regional rankings.

Bietau stressed that the team has some real talent, and the potential to make some big waves in collegiate tennis in the spring. He also believes that the team needs to concentrate on two important aspects to have the success they want.

"Potentially, we are a good team for spring, but in reality there are two things we need to do," Bietau said. "First, we have to improve throughout the season, and second, we need to adapt to being in a little bit of a different situation."

"We had some real successes, and now we are in a different role than we had been."

Yet even more important than everything else Bietau stressed, he believed the team just needed to get some matches under its belt.

"Most important, they are matches, and we need to play them in order to learn and get better," Bietau said.

David Mayes/Staff

Freshman Suzanne Sim returns a shot Thursday during tennis practice in Ahearn Field House. The Wildcat netters open the season today in Ahearn against Creighton, and then will play host to another dual Saturday against Southwest Missouri State. Both meets start at 6:30 p.m.

Arbitrator to decide Bo's salary fate

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Bo Jackson and the Kansas City Royals go before an arbitrator Friday seeking an answer to the $900,001 question: Which is more important, big name or big strikeouts?

The Royals have offered Jackson, a big hitter with a big name who struck more than any other major leaguer, $1 million. Jackson, the MVP in last year's All-Star Game and one of the biggest attractions in two professional sports, wants $1,900,001.

That's the biggest gap ever between any player and club. The decision by arbitrator Stephen Goldberg — expected within three days — could set the standard for other players who've filed for arbitration.

"If Bo wins," said a source who asked not to be identified, "a lot of clubs might go ahead and adjust their offers to avoid arbitration."

Neither Jackson nor his representative could be reached. But sources said a major component in their argument will be Jackson's marquee value — that the two-sport star is one of those rare athletes whose very name sells tickets.

"I don't know what they're going to say," General Manager John Schuerholz said. "Most of what arbitration is about is production on the field, the accumulation of productive years. I think it should be viewed as an individual case, weighed on its merits, decided on what's right based on what the facts are as presented to the arbitrator."

Jackson is among the most visible and celebrated athletes in the world. His booming home run off Rick Reuschel in his first All-Star at-bat led to his being named MVP. He also went on to rush for 950 yards and four touchdowns for the Los Angeles Raiders while finishing second with an average of 5.5 yards per carry.

Since winning the 1985 Heisman Trophy at Auburn and shocking the NFL by signing with the Royals, Jackson, 26, has blossomed into one of baseball's most feared sluggers. He had 32 home runs and 105 RBIs in his third full major league season, despite his being slowed much of the second half with a thigh injury.

He led the American League in RBI ratio with one every 4.9 at-bats, and was third with a home run every 16.1 at-bats. He also accomplished the rare feat of having 25 home runs and 25 stolen bases for the second year in a row.

What's more, fans in at least three ballparks saw Jackson do things no one had ever seen before. On May 16, he hit a home run off Minnesota's Francisco Oliveras and became the first righthanded batter to reach the upper deck in right field at the Metrodome.

A week later, he tagged Nolan Ryan for a 461-foot shot that's listed as the longest homer ever measured at Texas' Arlington Stadium.

He also holds the distance record at Royals Stadium, and in a spring training game last year he hit a shot off Boston's Oil Can Boyd that was measured at 515 feet.

But perhaps his most memorable feat came on June 5 in Seattle. With one foot on the warning track in left field, he threw a no-bounce strike that nailed speedy Harold Reynolds at home plate.

But the Royals can point to a few chinks in Jackson's armor. In baseball, as in football, he has been dogged by injury and never seems to be as productive in the second half of a season.

Most damaging are his strikeouts — he had 172 last season, tops in either league and a club record.

The Royals might also raise the point that as long as he shares his skills with the NFL, Jackson is making it impossible to realize his full potential.

Schuerholz declined to discuss what points may be raised but hinted that a player's marquee value has no place in the discussions.

"They should include all the elements that go into arbitration, comparing Bo to players of the past, comparing Bo to players of the same service group," he said.

Representing the Royals in the hearing in Los Angeles will be Tal Smith, former general manager of the Houston Astros.

The odd dollar in Jackson's request is to put him ahead of Texas outfielder Ruben Sierra.

Lindley vows to play

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A high school basketball star who lost a foot in a train accident last month said Thursday he hopes to play again some day.

"I can still play basketball," Chris Lindley said at Truman Medical Center, talking publicly for the first time since his Jan. 6 accident. "As far as whether I can play competitively in college, I don't know. I'm not going to get my hopes up."

Lindley, a 6-foot-9 senior who had been averaging 21 points a game for suburban Raytown South High School, had his right foot amputated. He said he was injured as he tried to climb between two cars on a slow-moving freight train.

He was not playing a game — but trying to help a girl who was on the other side, he said.

"If I thought I was doing something wrong, I would have (learned) a lesson," he said. "I was not playing a game. There were 6 to 10 feet in between the cars. I was going to try to help this person get back to the other side."

"There was a ladder in the middle of the car, and then I put my foot on the ladder and it slipped off," he said.

Lindley, who has been undergoing rehabilitation at the University of Kansas Medical Center, said he plans to get an artificial foot.

In November, Lindley signed a letter of intent to play basketball at the University of Kansas, which has said it still will honor his scholarship.

Pressure on Lady Cats

Women now have 2-game league lead

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

Now the pressure is really on. The Lady Cats, the preseason pick to win the Big Eight Conference this season, have bolted out to a 7-0 record in the first half of the conference season, and Sunday, the second portion of the loop slate continues for K-State at Missouri.

"Oh man, am I ready? I know I'm ready," interim Lady Cats coach

"We just need to take care of what we need to do, one game at a time, and just make sure that, right now, we prepare for Missouri."

— Gaye Griffin
Lady Cats' coach

Gaye Griffin said. "I think we're all ready. I'm not worried at all about the team being ready for the challenge."

"We just need to take care of what we need to do, one game at a time, and just make sure that, right now, we prepare for Missouri."

In the first meeting between the two teams, the Lady Cats' Kristie Bahner was able to shut down Missouri's biggest threat, Lisa Sandbothe, who scored 12 points, in K-State's 66-53 victory, but this time, the Tigers could be working to get the ball to Sandbothe a lot more than they were able to in Bramlage Coliseum.

"Kristie is really gonna have to do a good job on Sandbothe again," Griffin said. "And it's going to be a battle. We, the five seniors and the underclassmen on this team, have never won at their gym, so that may even give us some extra incentive."

What has helped the Lady Cats in their current seven-game winning streak is the fact that several people have been able to step up to the occasion. After Nadira Hazim, Diana Miller and Kristie Bahner took the last three Big Eight player of the week honors in a row, Wednesday night, forward Rita Matteucci stepped up and contributed 20 points as the Lady Cats knocked off Oklahoma State, 66-56, in Bramlage, to move a full two games ahead of the Cowgirls in the conference standings.

"I really feel like we have a lot of confidence right now," Griffin said. "We are just going to have to play extremely hard and extremely smart, and take it one game at a time."

"You know, a lot of people say, 'sure it's easy to play with a lot of confidence when you are winning,' but these girls really take pride in the fact that they are winning, and they just really need to make sure they have their heads in the right place."

As far as team play is concerned, the Lady Cats have been on a roll lately, and statistics prove it.

Miller leads the squad with a 17.3 points-per-game average, while Hazim nets 15.4, Bahner 10.5, and Matteucci 8.5.

"We really put an emphasis on having fun, whether we go through the conference season undefeated or not," Griffin said. "We always go out to have fun, and if you can do that, then I believe you can be successful. We just want to play, but we can also have a lot of fun."

Margaret Clarkin/Staff

Nadira Hazim and the Lady Cats will be hoping to gain their eighth straight victory Sunday at Missouri. The game tips off at 3:30 p.m.

Gallery displays Viennese exhibit

Architects better living space with super-block housing

By Ingrid Erickson
Collegian Reporter

The College of Architecture and Design's Chang Gallery is host to the traveling exhibit, "New Housing in Vienna," courtesy of the Austrian Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the city of Vienna.

The exhibit chronicles the reawakening of concern among European architects for social housing, said Lynn Ewanow, assistant dean of the architecture college. Design influences by architects Adolf Loos, Franz Schuster and Harry Gluck mark the progression of change from World War I to the modern era.

The post-World War I housing boom in Vienna was a reaction to the critical problem of overpopulation and lack of suitable housing. Faced with a challenge to provide affordable living space to thousands of people in a short time, architects developed super-block settlements, according to a brochure published by the Austrian Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

The super blocks were low, spread-out developments that affordably combined traditional building elements in a picturesque setting. These public housing places fulfilled the need to link new structures with the existing system of intricate city streets and canals.

Architects were dedicated to the idea of a garden-like city for the Viennese. With this in mind, post-World War I architecture gave rise to a collective identity for all inhabitants, with less emphasis on the bourgeoisie, according to the brochure.

Social housing of the '50s through the '70s was faced with bureaucratic regulations and financial cutbacks that left architects with little opportunity to continue the use of traditional Austrian design elements, according to the brochure.

The 1980s marked a turning point for social housing. A continuing need for answers to expansion and renovation problems led to a European competition sponsored by the city of Vienna to develop a strategy for new urban development of Vienna, according to the publication. The competition marks Vienna's 60th anniversary of communal housing.

The result has been a combination of architectural beauty and creativity linked to traditional city structures, according to the brochure. The old principles of Viennese living style discovered by Loos, Josef Hoffmann and Josef Frank have been applied in a new and modern context.

William Miller, head of the architecture department, said, "The European architecture has its own similarities, but the architecture of Vienna is unique to itself."

"New Housing in Vienna," will be on exhibit through Feb. 15, at the Chang Gallery in Seaton Hall. Admission is free. Visiting hours are from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., Monday through Friday. The exhibit is under Ewanow's direction.

Quartet to perform; music style diverse

By Laura Scroggins
Collegian Reporter

They're not your average string quartet. In fact, they don't consider themselves a string quartet. They're just the Kronos Quartet.

The Kronos, as they're most commonly referred to, are slated to perform at 8 p.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

Their repertoire ranges from the classical Bartok, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven to the jazzy, modern quartet sounds of Elliott Carter and Bill Evans.

Encores commonly consist of the raunchy Jimi Hendrix tune, "Purple Haze," and "TV Madness," a medley of old TV theme songs.

If that alone is not sufficient reason to suspect their differences, their appearance might be the tip off. Each season the Kronos unveil an eclectic expression of clothing that throws the audience and startles the senses.

Previous seasons have included such things as black leather jackets, combat-style boots and multicolored mock Russian tunics. The spiked and streaked hair styles sported on stage also serve as a reminder it won't be an the average strings performance.

A similar reminder of their avant-garde performance style is the use of stage props. This may not sound too strange until the quartet members start putting their instruments down, one at a time, to administer these effects themselves.

This do-it-yourself style is standard practice for the Kronos, which is fully self-managed and a non-profit organization. Everything they choose to do—from the music selection and each season's wardrobe to the special effects—is democratically discussed and decided upon by all the members of the group.

The members are Joan Jeanre-naud, a cellist from Memphis, Tenn.; John Sherba, second violin from Milwaukee, Wis.; violinist Hank Dutt, from Muscatine, Iowa; and David Harrington, first violinist and founder of the group, from Seattle, Wash.

Bramlage Director Charlie Thomas said staff members are on duty during events to assist those having difficulty getting up the ramps.

Thomas said he is not happy with the handicapped seating arrangement for basketball games or other events, but seating on the floor is tight. Another problem is safety, because the service tunnel is clogged during events or obstructed by a stage.

"I would be afraid for the safety of the individual if anything would happen," he said.

Additional seating in the area for the physically disabled accommodates those who wish to sit with their friends or relatives, Thomas said. He said he is open to suggestions for handicapped seating at graduations.

Construction is underway at Eisenhower Hall to make the basement accessible. A ramp is being built to allow disabled students access to the language laboratory, classrooms and advising offices on that level.

Ned Gatewood, assistant University architect, said the ramp will be covered and have an automatic door that will open into what had been a small room. He said construction is 30 percent completed and will cost $30,000.

Cooper said the project is part of a schedule of construction that includes the replacement of stairs and the placement of elevators in Fairchild in 1991, and the construction of an elevator to all floors in Eisenhower in 1992.

However, she said the pace of construction depends on the approval of funding. Funds for these projects will be supplemented by money from the Educational Building Fund, as they have for the past one to two years.

Meanwhile, Holden said, relocating classes in buildings with limited access continues to be a problem.

Calvin Hall is the biggest problem. She said while there are more students who use wheelchairs in the College of Business Administration than any other major, there is only one classroom in Calvin accessible to them.

Robert Hollinger, associate dean of the College of Business Administration, said about five business classes had to be relocated.

Calvin is slated for complete renovation, though the exact date depends on funding, Cooper said.

Thomas Frith, director of housing, said he would like to see accessibility improved so handicapped students could live in any of the residence halls, even though the University exceeds federal requirements, and housing can provide for the demand that exists.

Frith said Moore and Boyd halls are the only residence halls with facilities for wheelchair-bound residents, although all the halls are more or less accessible to visitors. In addition, two apartments in Jardine Terrace are available to the physically disabled and Van Zile Hall will be available when its renovation is complete, he said.

Funding for all improvements comes from user fees, Frith said.

Facilities Director Lawrence Garvin said his department attempts to identify all existing exterior barriers, such as curbs. The Coordinating Committee establishes the priority for these construction projects as well.

Holden said snow and ice also affect the mobility of physically disabled students on campus.

Jerry Lane, assistant director of facilities services, said curb cuts are cleared with sidewalks on a general schedule of snow removal and sanded or treated with de-icer.

A tractor with a blade is set aside to clear all handicapped parking areas on campus, said Jack Watson, assistant director of facilities maintenance.

Sylvia Nemmers, a blind graduate student in biochemistry and a member of the Coordinating Committee, she said she has helped identify some of the problems the visually impaired encounter with the facilities.

Nemmers said she pointed out to the committee that elevators on campus are well-marked with raised lettering, but doors, signs and hallways seldom are.

Frith said the housing department can usually cope with the needs of visually and hearing-impaired residents on an individual basis.

Holden said she believes the University no longer loses students because of the lack of accessibility to its facilities.

Enrollment of those who identify themselves as physically disabled has increased to about 100 people in the last eight to 10 years, an increase of about 75 people.

Because of the limited funds, the department must pay for the cars with a loan. Roughly $7,000 every year will come out of the OOE fund to pay for the cars.

"If they reduce it (OOE fund) then we'll have to find some way of saving money to pay for the cars," Beckom said. "Major purchases are difficult to do."

Communications equipment, computer systems and training programs also must come out of OOE funds.

Besides OOE funds, the police department also has access to the parking fund. The parking fund consists of all revenue taken in for the sale of parking permits and fines from parking tickets.

The parking fund has to be dedicated to parking lots, and can't be used for any other expenses. Part of the parking fund is used to employ about 12 students who help with the sale of permits and write parking tickets.

"We're putting in additional lighting in several of the parking lots," Lambert said. "We are also installing video cameras on several buildings to monitor some parking lots, and those items will be paid for out of parking fund."

Lambert also said that a new patrol car would be paid for by the parking fund.

The budget freeze is going to make it more difficult to complete the services they are expected to provide, and could even cause more officers to leave their job, Beckom said.

"Cities and municipalities can offer officers benefits and resources that we can only dream about," he said.

Good officers are going to ask themselves if they should stay, he said, or go and have the extra money and new equipment.

One way of taking part of the load off the officers is to hire students for lock-up and building security. These students are being paid out of OOE funds.

"We currently have five to eight students in security and lock-up," Beckom said. "But some of them work limited hours because of class schedules."

"We've asked Student Senate for $12,000 to $15,000 for student nighttime security help," Lambert said. "But we've been turned down two or three times."

"We're in the process of seeing what, if we have to, we can eliminate and no longer do, because we just don't have the resources to do the service-type activities," he said.

Although no services have been specifically targeted for elimination, Beckom said that some services campus police offer but most other police departments don't are being looked at.

Space

safety devices at the top of the list," said Lawrence Garvin, director of Facilities Planning.

"For the next five years, we really won't get any new space and so what we're doing now is trying to come up with ways of using what we have better," said Helen Cooper, facilities planning analyst. "It's creative space use."

Most departments on campus have had to use their space creatively by housing offices and holding classes anywhere on campus that space can be found.

"We have studios on the fourth floor of Fairchild, the second and fourth floors of Willard, and all over Seaton and Seaton Court," said Lane Marshall, dean of the College of Architecture and Design. "We make do like everyone else."

Farrell Library has also been making do for several years. The library reached 100 percent capacity in 1986, so 200,000 volumes were moved to the basement of Nichols Hall. Capacity is now back up to 93 percent.

"We actually went and measured the number of inches of empty space in the stacks," said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries. "We will have shelving space until 1994."

Hobrock said despite space shortages, the number of student seats in the library has been increased from 750 to 900 by placing desks in areas not strong enough to hold books.

The College of Business Administration has also been looking at squeezing in more desks. Bob Hollinger, associate dean for the college, said more faculty office space is the most pressing need at Calvin Hall.

"Currently Calvin Hall is at its maximum for space," Hollinger said. "Because of this we face a problem in being able to compete for faculty."

to district elementary schools were included in recommendations made by the core committee to the board of education in May of 1989.

Enrollment projections suggested a need for 157 general purpose classrooms by 1998. Currently, district elementary schools offer 155 rooms, although this number does not reflect space designated for music, art or computers.

A major concern of the district has been to provide the elementary schools with classroom space for art, music and computers, according to architects with the Ebert Design Group.

Options for elementary schools include building a new elementary school, improving existing facilities or doing nothing.

The architects also presented two options to install air conditioning at the Manhattan High School. Both plans would cost the district about $1.6 million.

Hal Rowe, superintendent of schools, said one obstacle for the board has been a state law which limits the amount of a bond issue to 14 percent of the school's assessed value.

Topeka, were awarded the contract. The greenhouse construction, contracted to R.M. Baril General Contractor Inc., has begun on the northeast side of Throckmorton. Late 1990 is the target completion date for the greenhouse space.

The additions to Throckmorton Hall would nearly double its current size. The total additions equal about 161,000 square feet. Plans propose adding two four-story wings onto the building. One wing would be placed on the east side, while the other would be built on the west side after the Hollis House is moved.

To construct the additions, the Hollis House, facilities shop and the small animal building will have to be relocated. The KSU Foundation will move from the Hollis House to a proposed location at College and Claflin avenues.

The additions will create more classrooms, laboratories and office space and also unite the divisions of the College of Agriculture. Throckmorton would then have the space to house the main portions of the departments of agronomy, plant pathology, horticulture, forestry and some of entomology.

"This is going to be a fantastic opportunity for us. We can consolidate our greenhouse space and it means more labs for teaching research," said Paul Jennings, head of the horticulture department.

Hayden's recommendations do not dampen the confidence of those planning the Throckmorton Hall addition.

"The state is having its problems. It is not a problem for us, but an opportunity," Cool said. "The work done in these departments boosts the economy of this state potentially hundreds of millions of dollars a year."

Science building. The next step for this amendment is deliberation, Peterson said. The longevity bonus recommendation will go to the Senate Ways and Means Committee, as Senate Bill 454. The recommendation for funds for the Throckmorton additions will be sent to the House Appropriations Committee. Both could be approved, reduced or cut.

The additions of these two fundings were expected by administrators on campus.

"We were hopeful, but one learns not to expect things," Struve said. Hayden's budget was submitted during the Legislature Session Jan. 8 when he made the State of the State address.

The amendment process to the budget is not a rare process.

Musically, the song is akin to atonal noise, underscoring the anger of the track.

Residents debate new landfill areaEureka Valley one of six possible sitesBy Bryan Ackley
Science Reporter

Local residents met with Riley County officials Sunday in a Eureka Valley schoolhouse to argue against a proposed landfill site north of the Manhattan Municipal Airport.

Riley County Commissioners Dick Jepsen and Wilton Thomas told the group of about 50 residents that land located near the northeast corner of the Fort Riley boundary is being considered for the new regional landfill.

The Kansas Department of Health and Environment ordered Riley County to close its landfill by June 1991 due to groundwater contamination concerns.

The land being considered for the landfill site is owned by the military, Jepsen said. The acquisition of the land would be made by trade or purchase.

If the county obtains this land, a new landfill would be constructed about 2.5 miles north of Eureka Valley, which is about a quarter of a mile north of the Manhattan airport.

Area resident Bart Thomas, who helped organize the meeting, said his home is closest to the proposed site.

"This thing will be in my backyard," Thomas said.

Thomas said he received no notice from the county indicating the land near his home was being considered as a potential landfill site until he "discovered men drilling test wells in the area."

He said he later read a newspaper article explaining why the test wells were being drilled.

Dick Jepsen, Riley County commissioner, shows what areas would be encompassed by a regional landfill near Fort Riley.

During the meeting, Thomas asked the commissioners if they would like to buy his house.

"What we've considered with this is that there are going to be winners and losers," Jepsen said. "The losers are going to be everybody who lives within (three miles) of the site, and the winners are going to be everybody else."

Because the state has ordered the current landfill closed, Jepsen said the county has no choice but to find an alternative site.

"We can't argue with them, so we're going to do it," he said.

Several residents voiced their opposition to the proposal, citing several concerns:

■ A landfill in this area would cause traffic to increase in Eureka Valley because county officials plan to make two of the roads passing through the community access roads to the landfill.

■ The westward expansion and development of Manhattan could be negatively affected by the construction of a landfill in this area.

■ Artillery explosions could crack the protective liner surrounding the landfill, and harmful chemicals could leak into the area's groundwater.

In response, Jepsen said he could not predict what effect a landfill at this site would have on the westward growth of Manhattan, adding this is only one of six sites being considered.

Fort Riley officials have been hesitant in negotiating with the county, he said.

Jepsen said he would not disclose four of the proposed site locations to avoid having other residents worrying about areas near their homes under consideration.

An area near Walker Quarry in Dickinson County is also being considered, he said.

County Engineer Dan Harden was unaware of the meeting, but was available by phone Sunday to respond to questions raised by residents.

Harden said if the Eureka Valley See LANDFILL, Page 10

Bart Thomas, Eureka Valley resident, discusses with county commissioners the advantages and disadvantages of the potential regional landfill site during a meeting at a school house in Eureka Sunday.

Protesters march for reform in Moscow

Thousands ask Communists to share power;
Soviets expect proposal multi-party system

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Hundreds of thousands of cheering protesters filled the broad streets of the capital Sunday to demand that the Communists surrender their stranglehold on power, perhaps the biggest protest in Moscow since the Bolshevik Revolution.

The huge gathering came on the eve of a party Central Committee meeting during which President Mikhail S. Gorbachev is expected to propose that other parties be allowed to compete for power, a move likely to spur an intense struggle between hard-liners and reformers.

The crowd waved huge white-red-and-blue flags of pre-revolutionary Russia and held signs warning party officials to "Remember Romania," where a bloody revolt last year toppled the Stalinist regime of Nicolae Ceausescu.

The masses stopped next to Red

Square for a gigantic rally that was meant to influence the pivotal Communist Party plenary meeting that opens Monday.

"This plenum is the party's last chance," declared Boris N. Yeltsin, a populist Communist leader who promised to place the crowd's demands before the 251-member Central Committee.

Others, harkening to the revolution that overthrew the czar in February 1917 before being swept away by Lenin eight months later, said a new revolution was under way.

"Long live the beginning of the peaceful, non-violent revolution of February 1990!" historian Yuri Afanasyev told the cheering crowd.

Some demonstrators at the head of the rally chanted "Politburo resign!" Others whistled in derision when they passed the Moscow city council headquarters on Gorky Street.

Trucks blocked Moscow's Garden Ring Road for the marchers who linked arms next to Gorky Park and completely filled eight lanes of traffic, stretching back more than half a mile. Cordons of uniformed police blocked cars elsewhere, turning the center of Moscow into a virtual pedestrian mall.

In all, the march and rally lasted for about five hours before participants began to disperse. Police observed the peaceful proceedings in the historic heart of the capital, but there were no reports of any disturbances.

According to published reports, party leader Gorbachev will propose to the Central Committee that the party give up the guarantee of power that was written into the Soviet Constitution in 1977.

The Radio Moscow news service Interfax also said Gorbachev was planning structural reforms that would reduce the size of the Central Committee and possibly eliminate the ruling Politburo. He also was expected to give tacit approval to the concept of private property.

The proposals are in the form of a draft platform to be placed before a congress, theoretically the Communist Party's highest body, that is scheduled for this fall.

Many Moscow observers expected a concentrated effort from conservatives in the Central Committee to stop the reforms they believe have brought the Soviet Union to economic ruin and ethnic strife.

Student's death remains mysteryBy Lori Mikesell

The badly burned body of a University student was found in a burned vehicle on the Manhattan Country Club golf course early Saturday morning.

The body was later identified by the Riley County Police Department as that of 21-year-old William G. Patton, junior in electrical engineering. Patton had been missing since Friday.

"Preliminary indications are that the body had considerable concentrations of carbon in the esophagus and lung tissue," said Maj. Larry Woodyard of the RCPD. These findings suggest that the individual was alive when the fire started, Woodyard said.

James Bridgens, a Kansas City forensic pathologist who performed the autopsy, said he had no comment on the autopsy report.

According to a press release issued by the Riley County Police Department, an employee of the Manhattan Country Club found Patton's vehicle, a Jeep Waggoner, at approximately 7:30 a.m. Saturday on the grounds at the north end of the golf course.

Kari Krause, assistant superintendent at the club, said she saw the jeep beyond the golf course maintenance shed and alerted the police. Cliff Dipman, manager of the golf course, said he looked inside the burned vehicle and discovered the body.

"There was nothing left. The steering wheel was gone, the seats were burned and the tires were gone," Dipman said. The body was on the passenger side of the car, he said.

The jeep did not appear to be stuck or involved in an accident, but appeared to be parked on the side of the road, he said.

Patton's death is under investigation by officers of the RCPD, the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, the Manhattan Fire Department and the Riley County Coroner's Office.

Battle in Beirut kills 210

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Rival Christian forces battled with tanks in burning east Beirut and fought with daggers and bayonets for control of a key coastal town Sunday. Police said 210 people have died in the six-day showdown.

Gen. Michel Aoun's forces claimed they captured the town of Dbayeh, 5 miles north of Beirut, from Christian warlord Samir Geagea, and Aoun's Channel 5 TV station showed paratroopers occupying what it said was Geagea's Lebanese Forces base there.

But Geagea's militia said the defenders repulsed 10 tank-supported assaults by the paratroopers and forced them to retreat after hand-to-hand battles with bayonets and daggers.

Aoun sent artillery, tanks and troops to seize the militia's headquarters in east Beirut, but the militiamen held off the bid to solidify Aoun's control of the Christian enclave in this ruined city.

Two oil tanks and scores of buildings set ablaze in the fighting burned out of control. Pillars of flame shot skywards and thick clouds of black smoke shrouded the area.

Police said 210 people have been killed and 935 wounded, mostly civilians, in the deadly fighting that began Tuesday in the Christian enclave, where an estimated 1 million people live. Both sides ignored appeals by clergymen to end "the senseless, horrific massacre of the innocents."

An estimated 500,000 people cowered in basements and bomb shelters as shells — as many as one round each second — rained all night long from Aoun's mountaintop positions east of the city.

At dawn, Aoun's tanks advanced through the northern Dora industrial district and the northeastern Rummaneh quarter, police said.

The offensive was an apparent make-or-break attempt to crush Geagea's Lebanese Forces and become the undisputed leader of the Christian enclave north of Beirut.

In the cold, dank underground shelters, food, water and powdered milk supplies ran out, radio stations said. Electricity has been cut off for nearly a week.

Hundreds of shells and rockets have landed in Moslem west Beirut, which has not been involved in the latest power struggle. At least 25 people have been killed and 105 wounded in the Moslem sector since Tuesday.

To add to Beirut's woes, a four-hour gun-battle broke out between rival Shiite Moslem factions in its southern slums Sunday.

Police said four people were killed and seven wounded before Syrian troops moved in to separate the Iranian-backed fundamentalist Hezbollah, or Party of God, and the Syrian-allied Amal militia.

They have been vying for control of Lebanon's 1.2 million Shiites, the country's largest sect, for more than two years.

Cease-fire appeals by the Red Cross, a group of 16 Lebanese parliamentarians and the Vatican's representative in Lebanon, Papal Nuncio Pablo Puente, were ignored. France also appealed for a cease-fire and said it was prepared to send medical aid to Lebanon quickly.

Six earlier truce accords failed to stop the fighting, among the worst in the Christian sector since Lebanon gained independence from France in 1943.

Shells hit churches, hospitals, schools and apartment buildings. The Christian Voice of Lebanon radio station broadcast assurances from nuns to anguished parents that about 60 children trapped in a school were safe.

Both Aoun and Geagea are Maronite Catholics, the dominant Christian sect.

The general, appointed head of an interim military Cabinet in September 1988 by outgoing President Amin Gemayel, considers himself the sole legitimate authority in Lebanon.

Storm kills 29 in Europe

FRANKFURT, West Germany (AP) — A storm that swept through northern France and West Germany with hurricane-strength winds killed at least 29 people and caused widespread property damage.

The storm struck western France on Saturday with gusts up to 104 mph. The storm, the region's worst in 20 years, left 23 people dead, authorities said.

Among the buildings damaged was the 12th century cathedral at Chartres, one of the world's most magnificent Gothic structures. The wind peeled copper plates from the roof, leaving a 540-square-foot hole over the nave between the two bell towers of the church, 50 miles southwest of Paris.

The state-run Electricite de France said that by midday Sunday, only 160,000 people remained without electricity of the 2 million or more whose power was cut at the height of the storm.

Rail and air service, which had been severely disrupted by the high winds, fallen trees and electric wires, was back to normal Sunday. Several main highways also had been blocked temporarily.

Officials said it was too early to estimate the cost of the damage.

Mayor, journalist killed

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) — Unidentified gunmen assassinated a mayor and a journalist and shot at a congressman in separate incidents over the weekend, authorities said Sunday.

The mayor's body was left draped in a flag of leftist guerrillas, who have promised a wave of violence leading up to mayoral and congressional elections early next month.

Also Sunday, the army said it discovered more than $2.4 million in cash on a ranch once owned by Gonzalo Rodriguez Gacha, the Medellin cartel leader killed in a Dec. 15 gunfight with police.

The money, found Saturday, had been buried on the banks of the Magdalena River near the town of Guaduas, 43 miles north of Bogota. Soldiers searching the ranch also found more than 100 weapons, an army communique said.

A Sunday communique from the Norte de Santander state government office said the mayor of the town of Arboledas, Pedro Jesus Hernandez, was shot and killed by several gunmen who covered his body with a flag bearing the initials ELN. The letters stand for the National Liberation Army, the country's most active leftist guerrilla group.

Hernandez, a member of the opposition Conservative Party, had been traveling in a car late Saturday on his way to inaugurate a cafeteria for poor children when the attackers opened fire, the government communique said.

Bush has White House 'Party'

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush and his wife, Barbara, hosted their third "In Performance at the White House" concert Sunday.

The concert was taped for broadcast Feb. 14 by the Public Broadcasting Service. It featured opera diva Marilyn Horne, singer-actress Patti LaPore, singer Jeffrey Osmond, country singer Gary Morris and the Dick Hyman Trio.

The theme of the concert was "A Presidents' Day Party." The earlier concerts were aired around the 4th of July and Columbus Day.

Study: Big cars are better

LANSING, Mich. (AP) — Bigger is better for motorists who want to survive a serious car crash, according to a new study.

The study found that the Chevrolet Corvette had the highest fatality rate — 5.2 deaths for every 10,000 1985-87 models registered in the United States — and the four-door Volvo 740-760 had the lowest, 0.6 per 10,000 vehicles.

The figures from the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety were released by the Michigan Association of Professional Insurance Agents.

"Without question, the consumer has a better chance of survival when driving a larger vehicle," said MAPIA President James Alexander.

Of the 10 vehicles with the lowest occupant death rates, three were large and six were midsize and only one was a small car — the Volkswagen Jetta with 1.1 deaths per 10,000 vehicles.

Twelve of the 15 cars with the highest death rates are small, and the other three are midsize.

"What we've seen in recent years is that the industry has placed such a great emphasis on fuel economy that safety has been compromised," he said. "They're lighter so they're more fuel efficient and that's commendable."

Icy accident kills 5 children

MOUNT VERNON, Mo. (AP) — Five children and a 20-year-old man were killed Sunday when the vehicle they were in skidded on a patch of ice on an interstate, overturned and burst into flames, a state trooper said.

The accident happened around 7:30 a.m. as the four-wheel-drive vehicle was heading west on Interstate 44 near this southwest Missouri town, according to Highway Patrol Trooper Leslie Crowe.

The driver, Howard Bouchard, 38, of Denton, Texas, escaped by kicking out a window, and pulled the children's mother from the front seat of the burning vehicle, but passersby held him back when he tried to rescue the others, Crowe said.

The trooper identified the dead as Edna England, 16; Clara England, 14; Ella England, 12; Virginia England, 11; and Virgil England, 10, all of Denton; and Arthur Brown, 20, of Watertown, N.Y.

Child found in school bus

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — A 5-year-old girl who did not return home from kindergarten Friday afternoon was found early Sunday in a parked school bus, police said.

The girl, whose name was withheld, was reported in fair condition late Sunday at Children's Mercy Hospital, where she was recovering from possible frostbite, police said.

The child boarded the Mayflower school bus Friday morning for Ashland Elementary School in midtown Kansas City, police said. When the girl did not return Friday afternoon, her mother filed a missing person report with police, who began searching for the child.

Police found the girl about 1:40 a.m. Sunday in the Mayflower school bus parking lot.

The girl was taken to Children's Mercy complaining of pains in her hands and feet, police said. The outside temperature in Kansas City Saturday night was about 24 degrees.

The driver of the bus was fired for failing to follow company procedures, which require drivers to inspect buses before leaving the route, said Kyle Martin, spokesman for Mayflower Contract Services.

CAMPUS BULLETIN

Campus organizations are encouraged to use Campus Bulletin. All announcements must be submitted by 11 a.m. one day prior to publication. Announcements for Monday's bulletin must be in by 11 a.m. Friday. However, publication is determined by the amount of space available on a first-come, first-served basis and is not guaranteed. Information forms are available on the shelf outside Kedzie 118. Forms should be left in the box there after being filled out. All submissions must be signed and are subject to verification. Questions should be directed to the Collegian's campus editors in Kedzie 116.

President to teach U.S. history course

By Anne Krauss
Collegian Reporter

History students this fall may be surprised to find the president of the University stationed at the blackboard.

Jon Wefald is scheduled to teach "American History from 1945 to the Present" next semester.

Jon Wefald

Wefald has a Ph.D. in history from the University of Michigan. He taught American history for five years at Gustavus Adolphus College in St. Peter, Minn. His area of specialty is post-Civil War America.

"I'm interested in all history — world history, European history, American history.

I'm interested in it wherever it happens, whenever it happens," he said.

Wefald said he sees teaching the course as an opportunity to get a first-hand account of students' perceptions of the University.

"What better way to find out what's going on than teaching students and working with students?" Wefald said. "I think I'll learn a lot."

He said another reason he is teaching the course is his belief that an understanding of history is important to understanding today's world.

"What I do when I teach is use the past to illuminate the present and use the present to get people to understand what went on during the post-World War II period," Wefald said.

John McCulloh, head of the history department, said members of the department were glad to have Wefald join them.

"It's something he suggested to me a number of times," McCulloh said. "We're happy to have him do it when he has the time."

As far as his time is concerned, Wefald said teaching will not detract from his effectiveness as president of the University.

"I've got good people here in leadership positions who know what they're doing and know their responsibilities," Wefald said. "I'll be working just as hard as ever."

Legislation would make harm to fetus punishable

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — The growing controversy over abortion jeopardizes a state proposal that would allow prosecutors to file charges when someone kills or harms a fetus with violence, supporters say.

"This is not an abortion issue," said Wyandotte County District Attorney Nick Tomasic. "It doesn't pertain to abortion at all."

Supporters point to 20-year-old Lisa Lang, a pregnant woman who was shot and killed last October on a Wichita street. Soon after, the six-month-old fetus died.

Authorities in Sedgewick County — as they have in Wyandotte, Johnson and other counties — determined they could not charge a suspect with killing a fetus under Kansas law.

Tomasic is pushing state legislation to change that by establishing a full range of crimes from first-degree murder to assault for killing or harming a fetus.

His biggest worry is that lawmakers, wary of the abortion debate, will flee at the mention of the word "fetus."

He thinks confusion with the abortion issue doomed a similar bill he sought in 1987.

The key distinction, Tomasic said, is that the bill is about fetuses killed with violence or car accidents, not about a pregnant woman's right to choose.

The bill, introduced recently by the House Judiciary Committee, states that it would not apply to abortions.

K-State Union Bookstore employees check trash cans as they fill with water Friday after a pipe broke and water leaked through two floors of the Union.

Broken pipe causes damage in Bookstore

By Steve Franzen
Staff Reporter

Noon brought more than lunchtime crowds to the K-State Union Friday. It also brought a cascade of water through the ceiling into the K-State Union Bookstore.

A pipe broke and released enough water to seep through two floors into the recreational area in the Union basement. The broken pipe was in a room near the chamber council rooms on the second floor, said Jack Sills, director of the Union.

Compounding the problem, a clogged drain allowed the water to soak some carpet on the second floor and drain onto the lower floors.

One of the most noticeable places affected by the water was the Union Bookstore. The staircase had to be roped off, and merchandise and computers under the stairway had to be covered or removed. Ceiling tiles were removed to allow the water to fall freely, and the staircase light fixtures were turned off.

In the bookstore, the result was wet carpet and some damp merchandise, said Kay Farley, bookstore manager.

"We were extremely lucky that it did not happen over a weekend. We are glad it happened over the staircase and not over textbooks during rush," Farley said.

Farley said there was only minor damage in the bookstore because of the quickness with which the staff reacted to the water. They formed a fire brigade line with trash cans, in an attempt to keep the water off the carpet.

The break occurred in the chilled-water coils, part of the heating/cooling system located above the bookstore. The valve and pump for the coil were shut off.

"Those coils are 20 years old. This has happened before," said Ron Zentz, building engineer.

Later in the day, the coil was patched, and the system was back in use.

Putnam wins College Bowl

They knew the fibers used in U.S. currency are cotton and flax. They knew Tolstoy was a 19th century Russian reformer who preferred to be called Lev Nikolaevich by his peasant workers. And now, the four members of the team of past and present Putnam Hall residents know they are the 1990 K-State College Bowl champions.

The College Bowl took place Saturday and Sunday in K-State Union Little Theatre. The competition was sponsored by Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee. Ten teams competed in the double-elimination event.

The Putnam team consisted of Lanham Lister, junior in marketing and geography; Tom Jones, senior in political science and pre-law; Mark Schreiner, junior in english; and David Rowland, freshman in history.

After losing to FarmHouse in the second round of the tournament, the Putnam team won the losers' bracket, setting up a rematch with the undefeated FarmHouse team for the finals. Putnam won the championship game 200-40, after winning 150-140 to force a second game.

Brad Amstein, chairman of the Issues and Ideas Committee, said the rules of the games were identical to the televised High-Q competition for high school students.

Each game consisted of two seven-minute halves. Points were scored when a member of one team was the first to correctly answer a 10-point toss-up question. Five points were deducted if an incorrect answer was given before the moderator was finished asking the question. If team members answered the toss-up question correctly they earned a chance to answer bonus questions for an additional 20 to 30 points.

Lister said his team was successful because the members are well-

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL

Administrators need to get on stick

Dear Mr. Hayden: I am writing this formal plea on behalf of college students. I'm asking you to please cut more money from the education budget so we won't have to go to class at all. With more cuts, students would be forced to pack up and go home or to another state where colleges can afford to offer all the classes students need to graduate.

Mikey, please sharpen your ax. K-State was forced to cancel only 24 class sections this semester with the largest freshman enrollment in University history. With these cuts, K-State is falling behind its peer institutions in course offerings, research facilities, technology and funding.

Governor, send us your best cuts now, and receive any volume you need from the Farrell Research Library as our free gift to you. We'll even give you 24 hours in Farrell to try and find it. By the way, thanks for the most recent cutbacks — the library was moved up to fifth place in line for building renovations.

Governor, with just a little more education chopping, you can win tickets to K-State's favorite game show — "Let's Cut a Budget." You have three categories to deprive: the library, faculty and staff, and equipment maintenance.

Question: The University of Kansas's

Watson Library has a budget of $10.4 million this fiscal year. Want to make a deal? Too bad. Farrell gets the budget-budget — behind curtain number three ... $6.4 million.

Oh, thanks for the small budget amendment for the Throckmorton Hall renovations. The $500,000 will come in handy when we need books from the library. And just for securing faculty raises and bonuses, we'll give you a free sample of Turtle Wax and a semester's supply of Rice-A-Roni.

Clean your royal ears out, Mr. Governor, K-State isn't a cornfield. Classes and library books don't spring up with water. Our peer institutions are passing us by. But that's OK; we Kansans are just sticks-in-the-mud.

President Wefald and other minute administrators:

Why are you touchy about our library? It's hard to cover up such a disaster, and you are failing miserably. Manure can be buried, but it still stinks.

You are often reluctant to answer valid questions such as why the budget for foreign periodicals is always being cut. Or, why there are so many periodical duplications in the branch libraries, and why the athletic department can still have more money than the library. Athletes also need a library. They are here to get a degree. Wefald, even one of your precious Rhode Scholars openly stated Farrell is an inadequate research facility for graduates.

Audra Dietz

Collegian Columnist

The bonus question is: how many faculty members would it take to bring Farrell up to par?

Parks Library at Iowa State University, a peer institution, has an $8.9 million budget for 1990, and 1,770,000 volumes in stock. Farrell's volume inventory is at 1,130,000, up only about 31,000 from 1989. Farrell is expecting a volume increase of only 35,000 this year. That figure includes all of the bound periodicals and books.

The reference system at Farrell is a joke. Students attempt to get print-outs for social science, education and biology periodicals. Students need a computer system to locate books quickly and efficiently. The card catalog system is obsolete and inefficient.

A computer system used by ISU, called SCHOLAR, lets students type in a title, subject or author to locate a book or periodical. The print-out contains the reference number and the building location where the book should be found. The system is easily updated and is accessible to all computers on campus and students with their own personal computers for research 24 hours a day.

Here at good old K-State, we battle a few confusing commands and lock-ups and search microfiche, only to find the library doesn't even stock the periodical listed. On the average, two out of three periodicals on print-outs can not be found in Farrell. The system is a ridiculous waste of time.

A major problem with Farrell is it doesn't have any alumni. Alumni are vital sources of revenue for K-State and each of its colleges. Farrell doesn't train and graduate librarians. Parks Library has the longest running librarian-training program in the nation. The program has put ISU in the top seven in the United States for the number of journals published by librarians. Parks is also a member of the Association of Research Libraries. Farrell is not.

The search for books and periodicals is a dangerous experience. Try it sometime, Mikey, then maybe you could at least allocate some survival equipment. Guns, spears, gas bombs — any of the stuff they haven't sent to Central America would do. Pseudo-floors made from plywood are wobbling and the shelves are poorly lit. You can see down two floors through the cracks. Noriega should have sought his exile in stack level 7B. There's no light, no oxygen, no room, and I don't think anyone knows where it is.

The graduate program is a vital part of any major university, including K-State. The absence of well-stocked research facilities deters some graduates from this University and makes work frustrating for those graduates who are here. Many have written in, complaining they have to go to other schools in Nebraska, Missouri and Kansas to obtain basic research material. Granted, no school will have everything for everyone, but there should be a limit to inadequacy. K-State has gone beyond that limit.

Improving K-State's research facilities and Farrell must take priority in this decade. Wefald is bragging about his enrollment increase, but when there are more students than books, we have a problem.

Space shortages affect academic life at college

A shoe horn isn't going to take care of this problem.

The 1989 report prepared by the University's Facilities Planning Office showed this campus has a space deficiency of 597,000 square feet.

That rather astounding figure was determined using standards and guidelines established by the Kansas Board of Regents and points out, in a dramatic way, the literal squeeze many are experiencing at the University.

The 14 percent shortage of space the University faces has touched nearly every phase of academic life on campus.

There isn't enough room in one building to house the studios for the College of Architecture and Design. There isn't enough room in Calvin Hall, the home of the College of Business Administration, to properly accommodate faculty offices. And capacity at Farrell Library, despite the transfer of 200,000 volumes to the basement of Nichols Hall in 1986, will be reached in 1994.

Space, anyone? Sorry, it isn't available here.

The University has put together a Proposed Long Range Building Request for fiscal years 1991 to 2001, and the needs of the handicapped and improvement in overall fire and life safety are addressed at the top of the list. That's wise.

But Farrell, now fifth on President Jon Wefald's list of budgetary recommendations, is listed eighth and 12th on the ranking of long-range priorities. Further investigation is needed.

Kudos to the Facilities Planning Office for its work in putting together the study. It is time, however, the Proposed Long Range Building Request is closely scrutinized and revised.

Only when all organs in the University body are functioning together for a better K-State will the patient get well.

Until then, the patient is going to have a tough time breathing — literally and figuratively.

Invasion lacks sense

The following statement was issued by the Steering Committee of the Manhattan Alliance on Central America. MACA is a local educational and political organization furthering the goals of peace and social justice in Central America, and opposed to U.S. military intervention in the region.

Manhattan Alliance on Central America

Guest Column

The invasion of Panama may appear to be justified when judged by its immediate results — the end of a brutal and corrupt military dictatorship. We are led to a very different conclusion, however, when we consider the action's wider impact on the welfare of our own country, on the people of Central America, and on the framework of international relations throughout the world.

President Bush has said that one of our goals is to promote democracy in Panama. True, Noriega stole the election in Panama last year. But President Salinas de Gortari of Mexico stole his election last year, too, and the administration and the media barely seemed to notice it. We doubt that our government is moved by a disinterested concern for democracy in Latin America.

Motives aside, getting rid of a dictator is not the same as establishing democracy. Democracy is impossible without sovereignty — the power of a nation to determine its own destiny free from the control of others. The invasion only increases Panamanian dependency on the United States, and once again places Panama firmly under U.S. control.

Democracy might have been achieved by a movement of the Panamanian people uniting against Noriega. The examples of East Germany and Czechoslovakia show us how democratic rights can be won by a determined and unified citizenry. The U.S. invasion pre-empted this development in Panama. Its most likely result is a return to government controlled by the Panamanian oligarchy and the U.S. embassy.

All the other reasons given for the invasion turn out to be fraudulent. The canal was in no danger. American lives were not threatened — at least not until the administration ordered a series of provocations that led to the death of a Marine who entered a restricted area of Panama City. As for the drug war, according to Drug Enforcement Administration documents, Noriega had given up the drug trade years ago. His exit will not reduce hemispheric drug traffic in the least.

Noriega began his career on the CIA payroll and became one of our government's trusted allies in the early 1980s while it knew of his drug-running activities. The Reagan Administration turned against him in 1986 only after he refused to collaborate with our aggression in Nicaragua. With the destruction of the Panamanian army, the United States regains Panama as a pliable ally, and can justify keeping our military base to "protect the canal" after 1999, when the Carter-Torrijos Treaty calls for our withdrawal. The invasion's real motive was to buttress U.S. power in Central America — and of course to show all at home that Bush is not a "wimp."

Such demonstrations of imperial might and manliness come at a very high cost in human life and material resources. Hundreds were killed, many thousands left homeless. The billions it will take to repair the physical damage done and to reconstruct the shattered Panamanian economy are only the tip of the iceberg. We must also reckon the ongoing cost of maintaining forces in readiness for such interventions in Central America and the Caribbean. That comes to $10 billion every year. In reality, the Panamanian invasion was made possible because essential housing, education, environmental and health care needs go unmet for millions of U.S. citizens.

Let us not forget finally that the invasion was a blatant violation of international law at a time when the major world powers are working to establish an international order in Europe based upon mutual respect and non-violence. The Soviet Union has gained in stature from its hands-off policy in Eastern Europe. While Moscow is willing to let go of its empire, we tighten our grip on ours.

We worry that U.S. policymakers will be emboldened to try again in Nicaragua or El Salvador, with disastrous results.

Kronos Quartet: Performers make unique, contemporary music by challenging norms, taking risks, mixing styles

Mark Butler

Collegian Reviewer

Challenging conventions and pushing existing boundaries seem to be goals for the Kronos Quartet, contemporary chamber musicians. Friday night's concert by the group at McCain Auditorium proved that taking creative risks can be a rewarding experience.

The traditional stereotype of a string quartet concert is that of musicians, resplendent in tuxedos and evening gowns, performing the works of long-dead composers. The Kronos Quartet has no qualms about setting its own agenda for a performance.

From the moment the quartet took the stage, it was obvious that the program for the evening would not follow a traditional path. Kronos shunned formal wear for high-fashion Italian suits and Spandex tights. The foursome has made a name for itself by such rejection of staid images. This complements the style of music the group plays. If the performers convey a less formal atmosphere, the audience is freed from standard expectations. All of this works on Kronos' behalf because the group definitely does not perform standard music.

The Kronos Quartet seemingly has only one rule regarding musical selections: the pieces must be from the 20th century. Stylistically, the musicians do not pigeonhole themselves. Friday night saw the quartet touch upon African, Eastern European, rhythm and blues, jazz and rock music for sources of inspiration. The performance revealed the performers to be adept in any style attempted.

The evening's program was split in halves. The first half was a collection of short works by a number of composers. The second half was a performance of a major work by avant-garde composer Steve Reich, written especially for Kronos.

The first piece, "Mu Kkubo Ery" Omusaalaba, initially sounded like a simple Irish air. As the piece continued, African undertones began to seep into the music. This unique fusion is a result of Ugandan composer Justinian Tamuszu's studies of composition in Belfast. However, it was the inventiveness of the quartet that brought the work to life.

The group's performance of Tamuszu's piece expanded the sound possibilities for stringed instruments. In addition to bowing and plucking, Kronos also utilized the instruments' percussive capabilities by tapping and slapping them to create a tribal feel. "Mu Kkubo Ery" Omusaalaba was definitely enhanced by the quartet.

"Cat o' Nine Tails" was described by a quartet member as "(Renowned animator) Tex Avery directing the Marquis de Sade." "Cat" essentially was a soundtrack for a non-existent cartoon. The piece animated itself, thanks to John Zorn's frenetic and diverse composition. Country hoe-downs settled next to funeral dirges for brief moments before zooming off to other tangents. "Cat" reconciled a multitude of musical styles in a unified way, much like a condensed film soundtrack.

According to the program notes, Zorn pieces his compositions together "moment by moment" in the studio. This fact speaks volumes for the quartet's virtuosity if it can play a piece not designed for live performance.

"Doom. (Sigh)" combined ancient Hungarian folksongs with the quartet's strings. In a deviation for typical chamber performances, Kronos played to a backing tape. "Doom" began with an ambient drone which erupted into a squall of dissonance by the quartet. The quartet counterpointed the

Non-traditional students gain recognition, honorary

By Tim Clopton
Collegian Reporter

The Fenix program is starting a chapter of Pinnacle, a national honor society for non-traditional students.

The chapter received its charter Jan. 9, making K-State the 40th chartered institutional member of the society.

"One of the things that we want to do is raise the awareness of the administration, faculty and traditional students to the non-traditional student population and the special, unique abilities they bring to this campus," said Betty Wollenberg, senior in elementary education and chairman of the charter committee. "Pinnacle is a way to recognize these students."

Pinnacle is in its first year of operation following two years of studies aimed at the lack of representation of non-traditional students in traditional campus honoraries.

This lack of representation is one of the main reasons Pinnacle is needed at K-State, said Crystal Sapp, junior in accounting and president of Older Wiser Learning Students, or OWLS, a campus organization for non-traditional students.

"The university system is not designed for non-traditional students. It's designed for freshmen," Sapp said. "We kind of fade into the background because we often don't have time for the other activities on campus that don't benefit us."

About 5,000 non-traditional graduate and undergraduate students are enrolled at K-State, about 1,000 of whom are younger than 25 years old.

Wollenberg said a non-traditional student is usually older than 25, a single parent, married or returning to school after a five-year absence.

"If you're a single parent, you may be only 18 or 19 years old, but you're non-traditional because you have another added responsibility that somebody else doesn't have," she said.

According to the constitution and by-laws of Pinnacle, a candidate for membership must have a 3.0 grade point average, have senior status the semester after induction, be involved in or have been involved in at least three campus or community activities, and show leadership and ethical qualities.

About 40 percent of non-traditional undergraduate students have a 3.0 GPA or above.

Wollenberg said an emphasis is placed on the community activities because honoraries such as Blue Key and Mortar Board often do not take them into account.

"A lot of times non-traditional students are commuting and don't get as involved on campus, but they may be room mothers or fathers, helping with scouts, involved with church activities or any number of things," she said.

The applicants will then be selected by a committee including the vice president of Pinnacle, advisors and one faculty member.

"We want people who are going to be leaders. We want the type of people who are involved because we want the recognition of honorary to mean something," Wollenberg said. "We don't want it to be just another organization."

She said inductions should begin in May.

Wollenberg and Sapp said Pinnacle should work on special events that benefit non-traditional students.

"Chimes works on a Parents' Weekend, but that really doesn't benefit a lot of the non-traditional students," Sapp said. "A family weekend would be better."

Wildcats drop 3rd straight at Nebraska

Squandered chances leave 'Cats reeling in sudden dry spell

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

LINCOLN, Neb. — K-State and Nebraska played a game that could have probably been titled, "You take it, I don't want it," Saturday at the Bob Devaney Sports Center, and the team that finally decided to take it was Nebraska.

The Cornhuskers used a partially-blocked jumper from K-State's Billy Ray Smith with six seconds remaining, as Nebraska finally grasped its first Big Eight Conference win of the season, 74-71.

"Any time you lose it's pretty tough," K-State guard Steve Henson said. "But the last couple of games we didn't feel good about our fight and intensity."

Nebraska started the game of Cat and Mouse between the two teams with a spurt that helped the 'Huskers build an 18-6 lead just eight minutes into the contest.

But Nebraska must have started to think the game was beginning to get too boring for the home-town fans, and K-State used several Cornhusker miscues to fight its way back into the game.

The 'Cats had gone on a 13-4 run that brought them back to within 34-32 at the 3:05 mark of the first half, and, suddenly, it was a brand new ball game.

"There was a big deficit early, but we fought and got back into it," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "At this point, you're looking for small things to be satisfied with, but we couldn't do the things we had to do to finish it.

"We opened a little tense and started making a little run. We got a lot better after the first 10 minutes of the game."

Certainly the 'Cats were a much better team in the final 30 minutes, but there were plenty of opportunities K-State could have taken advantage of.

Actually, neither team took advantage of several key opportunities, especially in the last two minutes.

K-State had taken a 69-67 lead on a pair of Jean Derouillere free throws with 2:19 remaining, and the 'Cats appeared to be heading toward widening the margin when Henson grabbed a loose ball after Tony Massop blocked a shot attempt by Nebraska's Dapreis Owens.

Henson bolted towards the 'Cats' basket, but missed his guarded layup attempt. Massop, however, was right behind him and tipped the ball in, but referee Rick Wulkow whistled Massop for an over-the-back foul, and the basket was waved off.

The foul sent Owens to the 'Husker end of the floor for a one-and-one attempt. Owens hit the first, but missed the second, and the 'Cats were still up by one and had the basketball.

A foul on Nebraska's Rich King put Wildcat center John Rettiger at the free-throw line for K-State's only bonus attempt of the second half, and the 6-foot-10 sophomore missed it.

Slow start sparks 'Huskers to victory

By Scott Paske
Sports Reporter

LINCOLN, Neb. — For 10 minutes Saturday, the Nebraska Cornhuskers dangled the fate of a single game — and more importantly, an entire season — in K-State's face. The Wildcats didn't accept the handout. "It's tough in that we had the chance to get it done," K-State guard Steve Henson said. "There were a few things, a few plays we could have made, that would have changed the outcome."

"We're searching for answers right now."

K-State's 74-71 loss to the 'Huskers at Bob Devaney Sports Center created an immediate need for solutions. With eight games remaining, the 'Cats' 12-10 record will hardly make NCAA Tournament committee members take notice.

"Our back is to the wall as much as it's ever been," Henson said. "Obviously, the road isn't going to get any easier."

Saturday, the 'Cats dug most of their own potholes. In the early going, K-State's Achilles' heel — poor field goal shooting — allowed Nebraska to build a 25-10 lead with 7:32 remaining in the first half.

"We opened the game a bit tentatively," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "We've talked about it a lot. When you haven't opened the previous two games the way you need to, something has to be done."

The 'Huskers, who entered the game winless in five Big Eight contests, were willing to cooperate. K-State clawed its way back to a 43-36 deficit at halftime.

Junior guard Jean Derouillere scored 16 of his game-high 29 points in the first half to spark the comeback.

By the 10:24 mark, K-State narrowed NU's lead to 57-55 on a pair of free throws by Henson. From there, both teams took turns foiling opportunities.

Billy Ray Smith scored all four of his points in a 15-second span that cut the Nebraska lead to 61-60. After a miss by Nebraska's Keith Moody and a K-State turnover, 'Husker center Richard King scored with 6:59 remaining.

The next three minutes showcased the pinnacle of each team's futility. Derouillere missed a three-pointer. King missed the front end of a one-and-one. Both teams committed turnovers and missed shots before Derouillere scored in the lane to cut the lead to 63-62 with 4:08 remaining.

After Ray Richardson's three-point try bounced off the heel of the rim, the 'Cats appeared to be over the hump. Henson took the rebound, dribbled downcourt and hit a three-pointer to give the 'Cats a 65-63 lead.

"I felt good about our position then," Henson said. "The fact that we fought back after being down was as encouraging as anything at that point in the game."

Henson's good feeling was short-lived. Nebraska regained the lead with 3:00 remaining on a pair of free throws by Clifford Scales. Scales burned the 'Cats for 25 points, including four three-pointers.

Derouillere gave the 'Cats a 71-70 lead with four consecutive free throws. But with 35 seconds remaining, Dapreis Owens broke free for a layup to give Nebraska the lead for good.

Nebraska coach Danny Nee was pleased with his team's performance down the stretch.

"We were reaching a point in our minds where we would get in tight games and couldn't find a way to win," Nee said. "This really gives us a confidence builder and takes the pressure off."

James' reprimand not correct move

David Svoboda

Off the Bench

News item: K-State coach Lon Kruger and Iowa State coach Johnny Orr were reprimanded Friday by the Big Eight Conference office for their comments regarding officiating in two mid-January contests.

In the reprimand, Big Eight Commissioner Carl James reiterated the conference policy against calling such matters into question in public, saying that such business should be conducted behind closed doors.

Reality check: Does Carl James have a clue?

As a former athletic director at Maryland and Duke, James has an extensive 35-year background in athletic administration. He has done a tremendous job in his nine-plus years as the Big Eight's top banana.

But he blew this one.

James apparently was doing his job in attempting to keep a pair of coaches in line with conference policy. And, if such policy calls for Kruger and Orr to remain mum when common assault and battery is taking place right in front of them, the coaches should have remained quiet.

But you really have to question whether the letter and spirit of the rule isn't really to keep coaches from tantrums following every disputed call rather than to allow two well-respected coaches to be spanked after they attempted to speak out about a growing problem.

Basketball in the Big Eight Conference, by the admission of John Erickson, the director of basketball operations, is no longer a non-contact sport.

Kruger realizes as much, and his teams have reflected that with their style of play since his return to Manhattan. Just ask Rick Calloway of Kansas. He'll tell you just how physical K-State is. He's told the media about those dirty 'Cats on at least three different occasions since the KU win in Bramlage Coliseum Jan. 27.

I haven't seen Calloway or his coach, Roy Williams, getting reprimanded, have you?

Nope.

That's because Calloway is a player (and thus not subject to the same reprimand for some odd reason), and he was talking about physical play, not professional wrestling tactics. With apologies to some "bad boy" I might have missed, Oklahoma's Jackie Jones is the dirtiest player in any game I've watched this season.

And yet when Kruger — a coach — speaks out against spitting (Skeeter Henry needs to grow up in a hurry) or flagrant forearms and elbows, he's made out to be the bad guy.

"You can't talk like that, Lon. That's just not right."

Well Carl, you aren't comedian Kevin Meaney, and it is right for a coach to speak out when he believes the integrity of the game is threatened.

Had Kruger made the comments following a loss, the re-

Creighton and Southwest Missouri State, and in the process, put on a tennis school for the two visitors. They crushed Creighton, winning all nine matches and ousted Southwest Missouri, winning eight of nine.

"It was a good start for us. The effort was good throughout the lineup," K-State coach Steve Bietau said. "We were a little bit sharper than I expected for the first match."

Against Creighton, K-State was virtually unchallenged, winning every match in straight sets. Creighton never won more than four games in any set, and twice K-State shut the Bluejays out. Valerie Rive won 6-0, 6-0, in No. 2 singles, and Sara Hancock repeated it at No. 3.

"It wasn't any secret to us that we would have Creighton outmanned, but it was a good start for us," Bietau said. "We maintained a good level of intensity throughout all the matches."

The main purpose of the first match, he said, was to assess where the team is in its training. After the first match he was still undecided, but was starting to get an idea of the Wildcats' progress.

"It is difficult to say (where the players are)," Bietau said. "I think they are basically ready to play. My main concern and interest is that we continue moving forward to improve on our performances."

Bietau knew the match would be pretty much an upset and was pleased with the Creighton shelling, but saw nothing that would change their direction before their next outing.

"By no means were we perfect. There were some things we need to work on, but nothing to change our direction before going to Utah," Bietau said.

In the Southwest Missouri match, K-State was again virtually unchallenged, winning eight out of nine matches with the only loss coming in No. 1 doubles. The Cats won every singles match and never let Southwest Missouri capture more than three games in any set.

Their toughest matches came in the doubles competition, where each match went three sets and required a tie-breaker in one. Bietau, however, saw good things and thought the team played just as well as in the Creighton matches.

Southwest Missouri's No. 1 doubles tandem of Sandra Banuelos and Isabel Minguez provided the Bears with their only victory, surprising K-State's Marijke Nel and Valerie Rive.

"We played as well in our doubles," Bietau said. "I think early in the match they struggled finding out where to hit the ball. After they found that, they played very well.

"It was a continuation of a lot of good things. We played well throughout singles, making choices about hitting the ball that showed us we are improving."

Bietau, although pleased with the team's performance, was especially excited about the play of Nel, who was almost two weeks behind in training because of a late return from break.

It had been rumored that Nel was not going to return from her native

South Africa, but she was also pleased with her performances and happy to get back in competition.

"I was quite relaxed and happy with my performance," Nel said. "I'm glad that we got two matches at the beginning of the season."

Lady Cats lose 1st loop game

From Staff and Wire Reports

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Missouri defeated the Lady Cats for the eighth consecutive time at the Hearnes Center Sunday, as K-State lost its first Big Eight game in eight outings, 79-64.

The win pulled Missouri to within one game of the league-leading Lady Cats as the Tigers improved to 6-2 in the conference and 15-6 overall. K-State fell to 7-1 and 15-6.

K-State trailed 56-44 with 8:19 left, but was able to cut the deficit to eight points on two occasions. The second was a free throw by Sheila Cherry with 1:45 left that pulled the Lady Cats to within 68-60.

But the Tigers, who canned 33-41 free throws for the game, nailed 13-14 charities down the stretch to pull away for the victory.

Missouri never trailed in the contest, as the Tigers jumped out to a quick 15-8 lead and led by 14 points on several occasions in the first half.

The Lady Cats closed the gap to 37-27 on back-to-back baskets by Diana Miller late in the half, but Missouri got the final four points of

Capriotti pleased with performances

From Staff and Wire Reports

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. — After three home meets this indoor season, the K-State track team ventured out of Ahearn Field House to compete in the 17th Annual Domino's Pizza-Illini Classic at the University of Illinois.

In a meet filled with what K-State coach John Capriotti said was talented competition, he was nonetheless pleased with the performances of his men's and women's teams.

"I thought it was a good meet. We competed well," Capriotti said. "It was a very competitive meet, and I thought we came out of it pretty well."

"We've still got to get better in some places, but overall I was very happy with the meet."

Besides host Illinois, K-State competed against Wisconsin and Iowa State as well, in a meet where team scores were not calculated.

Capriotti said Wisconsin and Illinois are two of the best teams in the Big Ten, and Iowa State is probably the strongest Big Eight indoor team this year.

The K-State women picked up four first-place finishes. Angie Miller remained undefeated in the shot put this season, winning the competition with a throw of 50-2 1/4.

K-State swept the mile run, taking the top three places. Janet Treiber won the event in 4:54.90, while Paulette Staats and Angie Barry followed in second and third places. All three recorded season best times.

Connie Teaberry met the NCAA provisional national qualifying standard in the high jump, clearing 5-11 to win the event. The guaranteed qualifying mark is 6-0 1/4 for the NCAA Indoor Championships. The NCAA sets a provisional mark in case the qualifying field is not large enough to have a competition.

It was a close, one-two finish for the Wildcats in the 3,000-meter run, as Marge Eddy finished first in 10:03.97, followed by Jennifer Hillier, 10:04.81.

Although the men didn't pick up any first-place finishes, there were a number of strong performances.

Clifton Etheridge placed second in the long jump at 24-8 1/2, while David Warders was the runner-up in the 5,000 meters with a time of 14:07.48.

Junior footballer Antoine Dulan, a first-year trackster for K-State, came in second in the 55-meter hurdles. Dulan finished the race in 7.51, while freshman Thomas Randolph placed second in the 55-meter dash with a time of 6.35. However, he ran 6.33 in the preliminary race.

The Wildcats will be on the road again next weekend, although they won't have to make such a long trip. The K-State team will compete in Lincoln, Neb., for the Husker Invitational.

AFC's late rally falls short; NFC wins, 28-21

By The Associated Press

HONOLULU — Minnesota nose tackle Keith Millard scored on an 8-yard fumble return and Los Angeles Rams cornerback Jerry Gray scored on a 51-yard interception return Sunday as the NFC beat the AFC 27-21 in a defense-dominated Pro Bowl.

The NFC, which built a 27-7 lead on Millard's touchdown late in the third quarter, barely held off the AFC in a wild fourth quarter.

After the AFC scored twice to pull to within six points, Dave Krieg threw what would have been a winning 5-yard touchdown to Seattle teammate Brian Blades with five seconds remaining.

But the AFC was called for an illegal formation, and Krieg's next pass sailed out of the end zone as time expired.

He had marched his team from its own 9-yard line before time finally ran out on him.

Krieg threw a 5-yard touchdown pass to the Dolphins Ferrell Edmunds to pull the AFC to within 27-14 with 8:08 remaining.

Browns linebacker Mike Johnson then provided a defensive TD for the AFC, when he intercepted Mark Rypien's pass — one of three interceptions off the Washington quarterback — and returned it 23 yards to pull the AFC within six points.

Although Krieg was 15 of 23 for 148 yards, the other three quarterbacks in the game generally had a rough day at Aloha Stadium.

Warren Moon of Houston, the only one of the four quarterbacks voted into the game who actually showed up, was under constant pressure from the rush and completed just 5 of 12 for 20 yards.

For the NFC, starter Randall Cunningham of Philadelphia was 9 of 19 for 97 yards, and Rypien was 4 of 10 for 65 yards and three interceptions.

Millard got his touchdown when AFC quarterback Warren Moon bobbled the snap from center at the AFC 32, and NFC linebacker Pat Swilling, charging through into the backfield, booted the loose ball up the field.

Millard picked it up and sprinted into the end zone, building the NFC's lead to 27-7 late in the third quarter.

Gray had given the NFC some breathing room moments earlier when he picked off a pass by Moon and returned it a Pro Bowl-record 51 yards for a 13-point lead.

The NFC has won the last two Pro Bowl games.

That's when everything started to get crazy, not discounting the fact that all of the latter happened in a span of just 22 seconds. The final 1:56 nearly took up a full page of the Nebraska stat crew's play-by-play recount of the game.

With 35 seconds remaining, Owens put in a reverse layup and was then fouled by Rettiger, who fouled out on the play. Owens missed his free throw, but Carl Hayes rebounded, and Nebraska had the ball and a 72-71 lead.

From there, two time outs were called; Nebraska nearly threw the ball away on an inbound play that was first called a backcourt violation and then reversed to Nebraska's ball out of bounds; then the Huskers did commit a backcourt violation with K-State drawing a 10-second count; then K-State, due to the Nebraska defense, was not able to work its play that had been designed to get Derouillere open on a double pick; then Smith's shot fell short.

Two oh-by-the-way free throws gave Nebraska the final margin of victory in a game that seemed like it would never end, or nobody would win.

"I told them I was disappointed for them," Kruger said of his post-game comments to the squad. "We got back in the ball game, but we didn't handle some things well. We need to look at it like always and try to make a little progress."

"These are tough times. We've got to hang in there and keep battling." K-State fell to 12-10 on the season and 2-4 in the conference. Derouillere overcame a slow start shooting the basketball (he was 4-11 in the early going) to end the game with a career-high 29 points. Nebraska's Clifford Scales had 25.

Bo to get Royals' offer

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Bo Jackson, No. 1 for Kansas City last season in home runs and RBIs, will be only 10th this year when the Royals cash their paychecks.

Arbitrator Stephen Goldberg, faced with the largest gap in the history of baseball salary arbitration, opted Sunday for the Royals' offer of $1 million instead of the $1,900,001 Jackson requested. Goldberg heard the case in Los Angeles on Friday.

"Based on historical signings and based on current salary comparisons that we made, it was our belief that our number was a fair number, and one that was responsive to the marketplace that exists for players in Bo Jackson's service group," Royals general manager John Schuerholz said. "We recognize Bo's talents and abilities as well as his contributions to the Royals and we believe, like the arbitrator, that this salary reflects that."

Jackson's agent, Richard Woods, was not immediately available. He said before the hearing that one thrust of his argument would be the marquee value of the 27-year-old, two-sport star. Jackson was named MVP in last year's All-Star Game and rushed for almost 1,000 yards this past season for the Los Angeles Raiders.

Jackson will be the 10th highest-paid member of a team that spent $19 million during the offseason for free agent pitchers Mark and Storm Davis. Mark Davis' contract included a $1.5 million signing bonus.

"They are offering him two-thirds of what they paid in signing bonus to Mark Davis," Woods said. "For reasons I cannot understand, Kansas City is taking a very hard-line position. It is absurd to say he should be the 10th member of the Royals in terms of salary."

Camacho retains title

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. — Saturday night and into the wee hours of Sunday morning, Hector "Macho" Camacho pounded out a bloody, 12-round decision over Vinny Pazienza, retaining his World Boxing Organization junior welterweight title and remaining unbeaten.

The 27-year-old Camacho, a former super featherweight and lightweight champion, had fought only six times in the previous 3 1/2 years. And he hadn't looked particularly good in two title defenses last year against Tommy Hanks and Raul Torres, both listless, 10-round decisions.

Still, the legislation may have problems, said Jim Clark, executive director of the Kansas County and "If you can distinguish it from abortion, you've probably got a chance," Clark said. "But in the climate we have, I'm not sure people will be able to distinguish it."

somber, passionate dirges were compiled by Hungarian composer Istvan Marta.

The end of the intermission saw the unveiling of another sound collage, "Different Trains" by American composer Steve Reich. The half-hour work represented Reich's juxtaposition of the train rides he took as a child in the early 1940s with the trains traveling to concentration camps in Europe at the same time.

"Different Trains" was a daring venture for all parties involved. Reich assembled taped interviews of Pullman porters and Holocaust survivors and extracted sound bites to create the basic melodies. The quartet played these melodies in the studio to assemble the basic structure of the piece. Reich then put all the existing parts together on tape and composed additional segments for Kronos to perform live.

The end result of "Different Trains" was an evocative, if somewhat repetitious, mixture of strings and spoken word. The music brought to life the vigor of a rebuilding America as well as a bleak, despairing Germany. The brief, spoken phrases served as a skeletal narration for Reich's work. Kronos often seemed lost in the sound, since the musicians were competing with themselves on the tape. This confusion never took away from the music itself, however.

The evening ended with yet another break from tradition. The quartet performed two encores from very unlikely sources. Jimi Hendrix's "Foxy Lady" and Bo Diddley's "Roadrunner" benefited from the most impassioned performances of the evening. Kronos clearly enjoyed playing the songs and had the audience roaring in approval by the end.

The Kronos Quartet certainly broadened a few horizons Friday. Expert musicianship, musical selections and a true verve for performance all combined for a memorable, original show.

remarks could have been interpreted as sour grapes. Had Kruger named names, or specifically referred to Oklahoma coach Billy Tubbs as a dirty, low-life skunk, the whole James response might have been worth the paper it was printed on.

But Kruger made his comments following a win, he didn't name names and he was refreshingly candid in his discussion of the entire mess. In fact, he showed tremendous restraint in not specifically naming Jones or Henry, though the videotape of the game clearly shows Jones displaying football tactics. Nice forearm shiver, Jackie.

James would have been better served to do as did Erickson when interviewed following Kruger's remarks — make no specific reference to any incident, say he was taking Kruger and Orr's comments under advisement and proceed from there.

A simple conference call to all of the league's coaches, in which James addressed Kruger's questions (and those of Orr as well) while at the same time told his coaches to keep their gripes to themselves, would have been much more appropriate than a public reprimand.

After all, isn't the public airing of a sensitive issue what James called Kruger and Orr out on the carpet for? Come on, Carl, practice what you preach.

And when you're done at the pulpit, try listening to the message Kruger and Orr were trying to get across instead of tying yourself up in the wording of a rulebook.

You're too good an administrator not to.

Connie Ridgway of Kansans for Life said her group supported the bill. The group backed Tomasic's unsuccessful effort to enact the legislation in 1987.

"This is part of protecting the unborn child," Ridgway said. "The pro-life stand is that the unborn child is a person.

"And, obviously," she said, "the mother wants the child in these cases."

But abortion rights groups are likely to argue the law ought to be left alone, said Adele Hughey of the Kansas Choice Alliance.

Amstein said Putnam will represent K-State in regional competition in Kirksville, Mo., on March 2-4. UPC will give the team $250 toward food and lodging, he said.

"Everyone was Bill's friend. Nobody disliked him. He was polite, helpful and a good student," said Stefan Hahn, junior in business management and marketing and a high school classmate of Patton's.

Patton's roommate, Steve Mad-dex, junior in business, described Patton as the life of the party, always having fun. He said that Patton was dependable and was always there to listen and help a friend.

ley landfill site is chosen, the protective liner surrounding the landfill would probably not withstand the vibrations from artillery explosions. "It won't be impermeable," he said.

However, a system installed to collect and remove any pollutants escaping through the liner would protect the area groundwater, he said.

A letter sent to local media last year by Allan Erickson, project manager for CH2M Hill, contradicted some of the search criteria mentioned by Jepsen and Thomas during the meeting.

CH2M Hill, a Milwaukee-based engineering firm, was contracted by Riley County commissioners last year to find a site for the new landfill.

The firm began its search in September. According to Erickson's letter, areas within the boundary of Fort Riley would be excluded from consideration.

Harden said county officials instructed CH2M Hill not to look for potential sites within the boundary of Fort Riley until county officials had established negotiations for land with Fort Riley officials.

When county officials established negotiations, CH2M Hill was instructed to test the land near the northeast corner of Fort Riley, he said.

"If we went five miles to the south, we'd have the same groups complaining," Jepsen said. "The county is going to have to find a site."

Special Summer Programs

Parsons in Paris June 30-August 13

Paint on the Left Bank, explore prehistoric caves in the Dordogne, visit the masterpieces of renaissance art in Tuscany. Courses include painting, drawing, art history and the liberal arts. Students may choose to spend the last two weeks of the program in the Dordogne or Cortona, Italy.

Photography in Paris June 30-July 30

Study both the aesthetics and the craft of photography in the city that has inspired great photographers for 150 years. Guest lecturers and visits to Parisian galleries supplement the curriculum.

Fashion in Paris June 30-July 30

Study the history and contemporary trends of French fashion design through visits to Parisian museums and costume collections. Guest lecturers and visits to design studios and retail outlets are part of the program, as are daily classes in fashion illustration.

History of Architecture and Decorative Arts in Paris June 30-July 30

Offered in collaboration with the renowned Musée des Arts Décoratifs, this program focuses on the history of French architecture and European decorative arts. Excursions to points outside of Paris are included; last summer, students visited Versailles, Vaux le Vicomte and Fontainebleau.

Modern Paris June 30-July 30

Combining architectural history with drawing, this program focuses on the development of Paris in the modern period (1830 to the present).

Paleolithic Art and Archaeology of the Dordogne July 29-August 13

Daily class sessions near the town of Les Eyzies de Tayac, in southwestern France, are devoted to lectures and guided visits to the area's famous and less well-known prehistoric caves, living sites and archaeological excavations.

History of Architecture in Italy July 13-August 11

The architectural heritage of Italy is studied in Rome, Florence and Venice, where on-site presentations are made by Parsons faculty.

History of Architecture and Decorative Arts in Great Britain July 10-August 10

This four-week curriculum, covering the years 1600-1900, is offered in London, with several excursions to nearby towns and country houses.

Graphic Design in Japan July 16-August 14

Design students and professionals will discover the excitement of Japanese advertising and graphic design through workshops, seminars and presentations by internationally known designers. Studio, museum and gallery visits supplement the curriculum, which emphasizes the sources, in the traditional arts, of much contemporary Japanese design.

Parsons in Israel July 23-August 19

Offered in collaboration with Jerusalem's Bezalel Academy of Arts and Design, the program provides an in-depth introduction to major sites of historical importance, to the rudiments of archaeological practice and to techniques of artistic representation.

Parsons in West Africa July 2-August 1 and August 4-August 25

Workshops in ceramics and fibers will introduce students to artists and artisans in several Ivory Coast villages, where these crafts can be studied in their original context. A photography curriculum examines techniques of documentation and reportage in regions of great natural beauty and cultural diversity. The history of African art and architecture also is offered. Additional study in Mali may be taken as a separate option, or as a continuation of the Ivory Coast program.

All programs include round trip airfare, accommodations and land transfers. Academic credit is available to qualified students. For more information, please return the coupon or call:

Veto may limit foster program*Parents discuss 19 years of caring as they await outcome of debateBy David Freese
Collegian Reporter

Floyd and Gwendolyn Dorsey have been foster parents for 19 years and have seen several dozen children pass through their home.

Their yard is cluttered with toys. In the house sits a black-haired, brown-eyed little boy who doesn't have full use of his left arm.

"This one came into foster care at six weeks," Gwendolyn Dorsey said, holding him in her arms. "Had he remained with his parents ..."

"... he wouldn't have made it to seven weeks," Floyd Dorsey interrupted. He paused. "We're used to seeing things like this."

Legislation that would restore $13.9 million to welfare programs such as foster care was overwhelmingly approved by the House Friday, and is being sent to Gov. Mike Hayden to face a possible veto. It has already passed the Senate. The bill, in its present form, would restore almost all the cuts Hayden had ordered in four Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services programs.

"The number varies, but currently there are about 15 foster homes in Riley County," said Karen Smith, a social worker who recruits and licenses foster parents in Riley County.

Barbara Dunlap, chief of income maintenance in the Manhattan area SRS agency, said the agency is in a holding pattern to see what happens in the Legislature.

Hayden has said the state's strained financial condition could not handle the spending authorized by the bill. He could veto the entire bill or exercise his line-item authority to remove portions of it. Hayden has looked skeptically at the 10 percent increase in reimbursements to foster parents authorized by the bill.

The Manhattan area agency has also issued a hiring freeze throughout the SRS agencies, which means that if a social worker resigns, that position will not be filled, she said.

"Most SRS employees and social workers are warm-hearted, industrious people and try to do their very best, but they're still overworked," Floyd Dorsey said.

"There are social workers in this area, and I mean in this area, that are carrying 60 to 70 caseloads — that's families," he said. "Heck, they can't even read through the material they've got; there's just no way."

"It's not just SRS, it's not just foster care — it's the fact that there just isn't money that's appropriated to take care of the kids," Floyd Dorsey said. "The money goes to everything except the basics, where the need really lies."

"People have got to realize that we do not get what you'd call 'paid' for foster care," Gwendolyn Dorsey said. "We get reimbursed at a daily rate."

Foster parents are reimbursed according to the age of the child, which amounts to less than the rate of reimbursement the SRS gives to day-care providers who only have the child six to eight hours a day, Gwendolyn Dorsey said.

"We have them when they're sick. We're up day and night with them. If something happens to them at school we're required to go get them. We do everything — as if they were our own," she said.

"I would dare say 50 to 70 percent of all the foster care providers in the state of Kansas would spend on the average $30 to $40 more per month per child than the rate of reimbursement," Floyd Dorsey said. "So people don't go into it for the money-making proposition. Understand that it's a money-loser."

"But it is for support of the kids in Kansas that need our help," he said.

The Dorseys went to the steps of the Capitol Jan. 23 for Child Advocate Day, to protest the SRS cuts.

"They expected about 250 and I think we ended up with about 800 (protesters)," Floyd Dorsey said.

The cuts in the SRS programs would have a wide array of effects, the Dorseys said, ranging from the closing of child-care institutions to a reduction in the number of people applying for foster children. The measures also could possibly mean that children who are physically, emotionally or sexually abused, neglected or abandoned would remain in desperate need of foster care.

"They had a meeting with the higher-ups in the state organizations that provide foster care, and the commissioner made the comment that 'in order for abused children to be removed from the home and placed in the care of the SRS in the future, if the budget cuts do take place, the children will have to be bleeding,'" Floyd Dorsey said. "Now that's the commissioner talking."

The Dorseys also said if the cuts come, the items that would be cut would be things that are deemed as "extras" and "unnecessary."

"The things that make foster children equal with family children — that's what's going to be cut," Floyd Dorsey said. "That's where the hurt's going to be because those kids will feel like they are second-, third- and fourth-rate kids. What are they going to turn into? Second-, third- and fourth-rate criminals."

"It just doesn't make sense to cheat children," he said. "If they would use that money for children, they wouldn't have to use that money for penitentiaries. That's for sure."

Senate considers Rec enlargement
Student fee may fund project; financing won't affect libraryBy Paul Branson
Staff Reporter

Student Senate has formed a task force to study possible expansion of the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex using student fees.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said he is concerned, however, about the message the Bonds that financed the construction of the Rec Complex, the K-State Union and KSU Stadium will be paid off in 1995, Student Senate Chairman Chris Kern said.

But instead of rolling back the cost of student fees when the bonds are paid off, Student Senate has the option of allocating the extra funds for other projects. As a result,

Student Senate has set up a task force to examine how the Rec Complex could be expanded using the fee money.

"The Rec Complex is always packed between 4 p.m. and 8 p.m. every day," Student Body President Todd Johnson said.

Johnson, who is also a founder of Students Helping Enhance Library Funding, said Recreational Services is more likely to receive these funds than the library. He said he was against using student money for library improvements.

"There will be no money spent from students' pockets on the library addition," Johnson said. "That's a state responsibility."

Johnson said he is confident the state will approve a financial package to improve the University's library.

action is sending to students and people who are working to gain more funding for the library.

"It sends a bad message about priorities to look at a Rec Complex addition while our library is bursting at its seams," said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries. "On the other hand, it would not be right for students to pay for the entire library addition."

State laws may cause fewer residents to fileBy Robert Short
Special Projects Editor

Financial disclosure and conflict of interest laws may be causing a decrease in the number of professionals filing for public offices state-wide.

Barbara Romzek, chairwoman of the Department of Public Administration at the University of Kansas, said financial disclosure laws for public officials "have already put a damper on people's wanting to run for public office."

"There has been trouble, of late, getting high-quality people to run for public office," Romzek said. "There are people who are saying, 'Sorry, it's just not worth it.'"

Individuals in some professions are going to be unwilling to disclose certain financial information about their jobs, said Jim Kaup, general counsel for the League of Kansas Municipalities.

"Does it serve any purpose for the public to know (a public official) sold a car to Jane Smith and got $1,000 compensation?" Kaup said.

The state attorney general's office recently filed two charges against former Manhattan City Commissioner Nancy Denning alleging she violated conflict of interest laws. One of those charges alleges Denning submitted an incomplete list of financial interests when she filed for office.

Some officials believe this case could affect public officials in local communities across the state.

"It is one thing to disclose all (financial interests)," said Commissioner Eugene Klingler. "But if you start having to put all your assets in a blind trust just to run for office, it is absurd."

He said although it is the right of the public to have access to a record of the financial interests of the candidates, it is not the public's right to have information on a candidate's private professional activities.

Avoiding conflict of interest ultimately lies with the integrity of the individual, he said.

"There is so much chance for overlap," Klingler said. "I'm not sure where the cutoff is."

Nancy Denning referred questions concerning her case to her attorney.

Denning's husband, John, agreed the charges filed against his wife could have ramifications state-wide.

"The (situations) are widespread," John Denning said. "A lot of public officials are going to have the same problem."

Klingler said he may recommend that members of the City Commission relinquish their membership with the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce while serving as commissioners. Because members of the commission approve an annual budget for the chamber, this move would prevent any appearance of conflict of interest for the commissioners.

Perceived conflict of interest is making it difficult for governing bodies to take a stand on public issues, said Commissioner Dick Hayter.

He said a "potentially conceived conflict of interest" on the Manhattan commission has, on occasion, left the city without a voting quorum. In local communities, which characteristically have small governing bodies, this could become a roadblock to the legislative process.

However, Hayter said he does not perceive financial disclosure laws as having a significant impact on the numbers of candidates

Gorbachev: Party must earn power

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Mikhail S. Gorbachev declared Monday that Communists must surrender their unchallenged right to rule the Soviet Union to the tide of democratic reform he has unleashed.

The Soviet Communist Party chief, in an historic speech to the party's Central Committee in the Kremlin, tacitly acknowledged the growing power of the pro-democracy movement that has swept away Communist regimes in Eastern Europe, set several Soviet republics on the road to multiparty politics, and on Sunday drew a huge crowd of protesters in Moscow.

But his move was unlikely to bring about the disintegration of the Communist Party, and Gorbachev, who is also head of the government, did not address the possibility of the party losing power.

The party wants to remain the leading force in society but must prove its worthiness, Gorbachev said.

In the future it "intends to struggle for the role of ruling party, but do it strictly in the framework of the democratic process, rejecting any kind of legal or political advantage," Gorbachev said.

Political reform that has strengthened the Soviet government at the expense of an all-controlling party apparatus, "has been accompanied by a growth in political pluralism," Gorbachev said, presenting a draft platform to the 249-member Central Committee. "This process can lead to the creation of parties at some stage."

Central Committee sources said Gorbachev told the closed meeting that political changes he has pushed through in almost five years in power have in effect created a multiparty system already.

He called into question a tenet of Leninism — democratic centralism, the theory that requires strict adherence by the party's 20 million members to decisions once they have been made at the top.

"The party's renewal presupposes its thorough, comprehensive democratization and rethinking the principle of democratic centralism with emphasis on democracy and power of the party masses," Gorbachev said.

He proposed the Central Committee meet again in about three weeks to consider new party rules.

Gorbachev indicated he did not foresee the reform overturning the country's socialist system as well as the communists' assurance of power.

The party was "ready to act with due account for these new circumstances, cooperate and conduct a dialogue with all organizations honoring the Soviet Constitution and the social system it endorses," he said.

The Soviet president said he had hoped 1989 would be the turning point for his economic reforms, but acknowledged that "recent events have shown there has been no change for the better."

Gorbachev's address Monday granted the basic demands of the hundreds of thousands of people who swept 60 abreast through the streets of the capital on Sunday. Communist reformers and non-Communists demanded the party give up its exclusive claim to power.

Reformer Boris N. Yeltsin, a leader of the rally, told the Central Committee the new platform did not go far enough. "In general, the impression is formed that it was written by two hands — both the left and the right," he said.

Transcripts released by the Tass news agency indicated Gorbachev underwent im-

Shamir requests search

JERUSALEM (AP) — Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir demanded Monday that Egypt track down and punish those responsible for a desert bus attack in which nine people were killed, and Israelis mourned their dead with silence and screams of anguish.

Israeli leaders said the latest Middle East peace efforts should not be thwarted by public outrage over Sunday's attack — the worst on Israelis in Egypt since the two countries signed a peace treaty in 1979.

Newspaper editorials noted, however, that the incident would almost certainly boost support for hard-line views toward Arabs.

Israeli victims flown home by military jet from Egypt's capital gave harrowing accounts of the several minutes during which two gunmen on a desert road raked their bus with gunfire and hurled grenades inside.

"Everyone saw his death," said Professor Yigal Barak, a passenger who was unhurt. "There was nobody who could protect us, nobody carried any weapons."

Girls having sex earlier

ATLANTA (AP) — America's teen-age girls seem to be having sex sooner, according to early reports from a federal survey of childbearing and sexual practices.

A 1988 survey of young women 15 to 19 found that 54 percent had had intercourse at least once, according to researchers with the National Center for Health Statistics. That compares to 47 percent in a similar survey in 1982.

"A larger percentage of teen-agers (are) initiating sexual intercourse at younger ages than in 1982," the Atlanta-based Centers for Disease Control said in its report this week, commenting on the NCHS research.

"That's a fair conclusion to draw from this," said Dr. William Pratt, chief of the NCHS' Family Growth Survey Branch in Hyattsville, Md. "We're quite sure it's real."

The NCHS' Family Growth Survey questioned 8,450 young women, representing a national sample. Interviews were conducted one-on-one in the participants' homes.

AIDS patients: 'suicide better'

LOS ANGELES (AP) — They swallow deadly drugs, plunge out of windows, smash their cars and hang or shoot themselves at an alarming rate. And they do it because suicide seems better than the alternative: dying of AIDS.

"You have no control over this illness at all, so it gives me some kind of control when I can say I can end my life any time I want to," said Chuck Sporeman, a 43-year-old nurse who has AIDS.

Sporeman tried to kill himself twice in December 1988, two months after his male companion of 13 years died of AIDS. He said he might try again when the disease leaves him unable to care for himself, but participation in a support group helps, at least for now.

"There are days where I wish I had done it, but there are other days when it's a beautiful day, the wind is blowing through the trees, I can go watch the waves crashing on the beach, and I'm glad I didn't do it," he said.

The author of a 1988 Cornell University study estimates about 1,000 AIDS patients in the United States will kill themselves by 1991. The study found people with AIDS are 66 times more likely to commit suicide than the general population.

Reagan must give deposition

WASHINGTON (AP) — A federal judge Monday ordered former President Reagan to give a videotaped deposition for the Iran-Contra trial of John Poindexter, and to turn over 33 entries from his diary immediately to his former national security adviser.

"Former President Reagan's testimony will be taken by way of a videotaped deposition" at "an appropriate place and a date" before the Feb. 20 start of Poindexter's trial, said U.S. District Judge Harold Greene.

Reagan promptly invoked executive privilege to avoid turning portions of his diaries over to Poindexter. "Former President Reagan hereby asserts his claim to the constitutionally protected privacy of his diaries," said Theodore Olson, one of Reagan's attorneys.

The judge's order gave Reagan and the Bush administration until Friday to invoke executive privilege on the matter of videotaped testimony.

In Los Angeles, Reagan spokesman Mark Weinberg refused comment on the order for a videotaped deposition, but said the former president was invoking executive privilege regarding the diary entries to give his lawyers time to "evaluate the need" for them.

Lawyer requests new trial

EMPORIA (AP) — The lawyer for a man convicted last month of first-degree murder in a church shooting says mistakes he and the judge made warrant a new trial for the defendant.

Cortland Berry, the court-appointed lawyer for Cheun-Phon Ji, made the remarks in a motion filed Friday in Lyon County District Court, where Ji was convicted of one count of first-degree murder and six counts of attempted first-degree murder.

"The court misstated the law on insanity to the jury and directed it to disregard the testimony of the defendant's experts," the motion said.

Berry said Monday that Judge James Smith, who presided at Ji's trial, instructed the jury to disregard testimony about Ji's lack of knowledge of right and wrong and watered down the importance of defense witnesses' testimony.

The motion also said Smith improperly admitted statements made by Ji "which were unlawfully obtained" by prosecution witnesses and a Topeka forensic psychiatrist, Roy Lacoursiere.

Berry said Lacoursiere did not read Ji his Miranda rights when he tested the defendant's sanity in November 1988.

Bill to require funds withheld

TOPEKA (AP) — A bill that would require employers to withhold child support from employees' paychecks was sent by the House Judiciary Committee Monday to a subcommittee for possible revision.

The bill specifies conditions under which withholding of child support from parents without child custody would be automatic. Currently, such withholding orders can be filed only if payments are 30 days late.

His office filled with books and memorabilia from his worldwide studies, Ronald West, professor of geology, specializes in fossil research. West specializes in the study of the chaetiid sponge, not a plant but an animal organism, and where it is found around the earth.

By Amy D. Hadlock
Collegian Reporter
Geology research takes a K-State professor all over the United States and around the world.

Ronald West, professor of geology, studies fossils and where they originated.

"Trying to understand how the different fossils are related and building a case to back up my explanation is something I have always been interested in," West said.

When attempting to determine where fossils originated one also has to understand coastal environments, so he studies them as well, he said.

A certain organism has West fascinated, however. Conducting research on the chaetiid sponge has led him to such places as Oxford and Plymouth, England; Marseilles, France; Scotland;

Professor travels world for study

West seeks to explain conditions for organism's presence on coasts

Jordan and St. Catherine's Island, off the coast of Georgia. West is trying to understand why the sponge lives in some places and not in others.

"We don't know where the chaetiid sponge belongs in the whole animal kingdom," West said. "We know the least about it, so I want to study it."

The chaetiid sponge is not a plant, but an animal organism. It lives by feeding on other organisms and filtering water, West said. It closely resembles a honeycomb.

Students also benefit from West's travels and research.

Real-life experiences are better for students, West said. It is easier for a student to learn from a professor's experiences than from just reading a textbook.

The geology department is incorporating new teaching methods, West said.

West has other hobbies in addition to geologic research. He and his wife, Dixie, are interested in the 19th century.

"I find the 19th century interesting because it was the age of real exploration by the British," West said.

"Our house was built at the turn of the century, and we are redoing it and filling it with Victorian antiques," he said.

West came to K-State in fall 1969.

"After school I spent some time doing research in marine labs in Massachusetts, Florida, California and Texas and then came to K-State," West said.

"I came to Manhattan because I liked the rocks in eastern Kansas," he said. "I continue to stay here because I really like Manhattan."

Balance needed to fight warming, says president

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush called Monday for balancing economic and environmental concerns when dealing with global warming, prompting environmentalists to accuse him of siding with industry and avoiding a pressing world problem.

Bush, speaking to an international conference on the threat of a world "greenhouse" effect, said "our policies must be consistent with economic growth." And he suggested that in some areas of the debate "politics and opinion have outpaced the science."

Environmentalists at the conference suggested the problem was not scientific but a lack of U.S. leadership in dealing with the issue. One participant called Bush's comments "a gross disappointment."

On Capitol Hill, Sen. Albert Gore Jr., D-Tenn., a frequent critic of Bush's stand on global warming, said the president was "moving as slow as molasses" on the issue when many scientists already are convinced decisive action is needed.

But the president, addressing the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, said nations must strike a bargain between curbing pollution that is causing a warming of the earth and maintaining economic growth.

Arguing that key scientific questions have yet to be answered, Bush suggested it was too early to unleash an action plan aimed at specific pollution reductions as many environmentalists — and some European countries — have said is required.

Later at the White House, presidential spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said Bush does not believe it is "time for a call to arms" on the global warming issue, but "time for a call to research and to find out more about it."

"Our goal continues to be matching policy commitments to emerging scientific knowledge — and a reconciling of environmental protection to the continued benefits of economic development," Bush said.

The remarks brought a subdued reaction from many of the participants at the international conference sponsored by the United Nations and attended by representatives from some 60 nations.

Delegates from some European countries, including Norway, Denmark and Sweden, have argued that enough scientific knowledge has been accumulated to warrant a commitment from industrial nations to at least stabilize carbon dioxide pollution at current levels over the next decade.

Scientists are concerned that the accumulation of man-made pollutants, largely carbon dioxide from the burning of fossil fuels, is creating a serious global problem.

Like a greenhouse, the pollution traps heat and reflects it back to earth, causing a warming of the globe. While there is little dispute that greenhouse gases are increasing, there remains disagreement within the scientific community as to how severe the warming will become and what effect it might have on the earth.

If the pollutants are left unchecked, many scientists expect the earth's temperature to rise by 4 to 9 degrees by the middle of the next century, perhaps causing coastal flooding and droughts in interior regions.

On the other hand, reducing greenhouse gases would require major shifts from the use of coal, oil and natural gas, which are mainstays for a broad range of industries. Industrial leaders have raised concerns that if pollution controls are imposed too quickly, there could be severe economic disruption.

Daniel Becker of the Sierra Club, said of Bush's speech, "It was a gross disappointment. There was more talk in the speech about economics than about the environment."

Stewart Boyle of the Association for the Conservation of Energy in Great Britain said Bush's remarks demonstrated "a leadership crisis" on the global warming issue at the White House. "About the only thing we can say about it is he turned up" at the conference, said Boyle.

In his speech, Bush said he is determined to "produce policies that work" and suggested some of his critics "may be tempted to exploit legitimate concerns for political positioning."

Cowboy wannabees not the real McCoy

K-State is one of those few universities that can rightfully refer to itself as an agricultural school. Other universities can pray all they want that one day they might wake up to find themselves agricultural as well. But alas, it is not to be.

Students at the University of Kansas want to be agricultural so bad they could spit. But they are not, and they know it. In their desperation, they resort to making fun of K-State's aggriness. It makes us irate, but we pity them and their position — they taunt us because they realize they can never equal K-State.

Their cold, evil feelings seep from the rank pool of self-hatred in which they wallow like pigs. (This also is a feeble attempt at becoming agricultural.) Poor souls.

But even K-State has both true aggies and aggie wannabees. More specifically, there are the cowboys and the cowboy wannabees. And, interestingly enough, the wannabee variety is mostly found among the male of the species.

Farmers tend to behave and dress like everyone else. It is merely a fact most farming operations can be as efficiently performed in tennis shoes and shorts, or even a business suit, as they could in boots and a hat. Thus, a farmer cannot call attention to his aggriness through his dress.

Cowboys, on the other hand, require certain apparel designed to prevent injury and protect the wearer from exposure to the elements. Some of the cowboy's clothing is very distinct, and it labels the wearer immediately as an aggie.

Aggie pride has brought cowboys, cowboy wannabees, and their clothing out of the closet. Today a veritable plethora of these people can be seen shuffling around campus.

Once upon a time however (about three years ago), K-State was affected by other schools' aggie-bashing, and tried to hide the fact that it was an agricultural school. Students misinterpreted the taunting as a sign that aggriness was out. People wore oxfords and penny loafers in an attempt to avoid the cruel jokes, even though the efforts tended to be ineffective.

One day, a student decided he was going to, by God, wear his ranch clothing anyway. If people didn't like it, they could ... and so on. For a long time (about a year), this student received criticism from his own classmates.

People called him names like "cowboy of the day" and other nasty things in hopes to quench the ridicule from other schools. But the student persisted in wearing his boots, hat, range coat and Wrangler jeans.

Then, suddenly, another cowboy came out of the closet, and another. Soon there were at least six full-dressed and ready-to-wrangle cowboys on campus.

John Mussman

Collegian Columnist

People started saying, "Gee he looks really neat!"

And then the wannabees appeared.

Today there are so many felt hats and boots on campus it isn't even funny. The wannabees have got the art of imitation down to a science — it is extremely hard to tell a wannabee from the real thing.

All the same, there are distinguishing factors that remove the guess work from wannabee identification.

The first place to look is the Ranch Saloon. This is obviously a cowboy spot. It is so cowboy that if you don't dress the part they will look at you funny. For this reason, seeing someone at the Ranch is inconclusive when taken alone. An accompanying survey of Aggieville is in order.

Cowboys don't go to Kite's. If they do go to Kite's, they don't want to be there very long, and they don't change their clothing before they go in. If a person is seen at the Ranch wearing cowboy-type clothing, and then observed in Kite's wearing a nice sweater, ripped jeans and loafers, he is not a cowboy, but a wannabee.

There are occasions when true cowboys can be observed in Kite's not wearing ranch garb. But they will wear sweats, ratty tennis shoes and a dirty baseball cap which promotes beef or beef by-product consumption. A hat that says "Kill Commie Bastards" means he's a trucker.

Cowboys often feel strongly about communism, but they don't advertise it. They will talk your head off about it if you give them a chance, though.

One true cowboy has observed when it comes to bandanas, "silk is for show, and cotton is for blow." Many a wannabee has overlooked this crucial factor and worn cotton around his neck. Incidentally, a cowboy will never call his kerchief a bandana, but a "wild rag." However most wannabees have figured out the correct terminology.

A cowboy usually has at least one pair of jeans that is stained with rumen fluid and bovine excrement. These stains, if they are the real thing, refuse to wash out, and thus will remain on the clothing for life. If the stain occurs in the crotch of the jeans, most true cowboys will not wear that pair on campus, although some have been known to do so.

A cowboy will drive any vehicle, though he wishes he had a pick-up. The vehicle, while it may be clean and shiny on the outside, usually has a pile of varied and mostly unidentifiable junk stuffed under the seats.

A wannabee always drives a pickup, and it is always clean and shiny both inside and out. If there is stuff under the seats, he knows what it is and why it is there.

Of course this column has just negated itself. The wannabees now know what they need to change in order to perfect the image. It's kind of like hearing Tom Brokaw say on the national news, "The shuttle will be carrying a top secret military satellite designed to spy on the Kremlin by using highly confidential circuitry which can be destroyed by radiation."

Well it's kind of like that.

Hayden attempting to salvage death penalty

Gov. Mike Hayden is fighting for his political life. Kansans are upset about reappraisal, the Dave Owen affair and a general notion that he is a do-nothing governor. With all this against him, he has a long fight ahead.

But for Hayden to sink to the level of saying accused murderer Richard Grissom committed his crimes in Kansas because the state doesn't have the death penalty is not only below the office of governor, it is well below that of any rational being.

Grissom, for one thing, has not been convicted of the murders of three Johnson County women for which he has been charged with. He is in jail waiting for his day in court.

Also, it has not been established if the women were killed in Kansas. No bodies have ever been recovered. In fact, it has not even been proven that they were killed at all.

It also seems Hayden is discounting the fact that Grissom, along with his alleged victims, are all Kansas residents. Whether Grissom did kill these three women in Kansas because of the lack of a death penalty is something that not even the great Mike Hayden can foresee.

Hayden is using this tragic situation to his own advantage and it stinks. His speculations, misinformation and fantasies are meant only to salvage the one issue he has left — the death penalty.

Hayden's statements on this case shows either a blatant disregard or total ignorance of reason, logic and the law. None of these qualities is befitting of any state employee, much less the governor.

Cartoon unjust

Editor,

Once again, (Ripple cartoonist) Jill Hayden feels the need to bash on the greek system. I don't know if she has singled out K-State greeks because we are recognized as having one of the strongest greek systems in the nation, or if it is merely a random attack directed at greeks in general. I would be interested to know if Jill has any first-hand basis for her hostility, or if she simply can't come up with anything entertaining to write about.

Honestly Jill, was it really necessary to use the term "frat" in reference to a fraternity? This term is in a very poor taste as it brings with it connotations of malice as well as misconceptions. Hadn't you already made your point by attempting to depict fraternity members as having no goals but to drink beer and make sexist comments? We are the first to admit that we are not perfect — we do not claim to be. We do, however, claim that we are striving for better cooperation between the greek system and those students who have chosen alternative living arrangements. Why, when we seek to work together for the benefit of K-State, must you seek to perpetuate a mindset which can only be detrimental to all those involved? We, as students here at K-State, have a good thing going. Let's work together to insure that it only gets better.

Column refuted

Editor,

Audra Dietz states in her Feb. 5 column that, "students need a computer system to locate books quickly and efficiently," and then compares the lack of same in Farrell Library to SCHOLAR at Iowa State's Park Library.

In fact, using first-year Margin of Excellence money, K-State installed the NOTIS online catalog one year ago. Now that we have a central mainframe computer big enough to run it, we are only months away from making it available to K-State students.

SCHOLAR at ISU is being scrapped after only one year because of inadequate response times and a bankrupt vendor. SCHOLAR is being replaced by NOTIS. Thus, our NOTIS system can talk to the ISU NOTIS system over BITNET. So, watch for it, some good things are about to happen at Farrell. Our NOTIS system will be called LYNX.

Regarding, "the reference system at Farrell is a joke," I suggest that you compare. The broad array of CD-ROM indexes at Farrell is unmatched in most Big-8 libraries. CD-ROM indexes replace printed indexes and give rapid access to current journal articles. They have nothing to do with the catalog. They are quite separate systems and have different uses.

Nevertheless, thanks to students for being interested in an improved library. Your opinions really do matter to K-State administrators. We need your help to improve the money supply to get a lot of problems solved campus-wide.

Members needed

Editor,

The recent attention given to Farrell Library by K-State students is a positive step toward raising public awareness of the problems associated with the library facilities. The Friends of the KSU Libraries applaud the efforts made by Todd Johnson and the Students Helping Enhance Library Funding organization.

It is important to remember, however, a library is more than a facility. It is also professional staff, books, journal subscriptions, special collections, programs and adequate equipment. In recent years, the Friends have provided support by retaining journal subscriptions, contributing to the purchase of the one-millionth volume and purchasing a special copy machine for books. We have been able to do this through book sales, the annual spring dinner and membership drives.

In order to continue this support for these services and to help Farrell become a member of the Association of Research Libraries, we need administrators, faculty, and students to show their commitment to Farrell by joining the Friends. One united organization demonstrates to the Regents and legislatures that the K-State community is dedicated to improving Farrell Library. Please stop by the Friends display at Farrell to pick up a brochure and membership application and join today. Your contribution is tax-deductible.

Thank you for your support. We welcome you.

Orr pays no mind to Big 8 reprimand

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — No matter how hard it tries, the Big Eight Conference can't seem to muzzle Johnny Orr.

Iowa State's outspoken basketball coach was taken to task last week, along with K-State's Lon Kruger, for voicing public disapproval of officials. Commissioner Carl James sternly reprimanded Orr and Kruger, saying their action "...creates a negative response to the image of the conference."

But Orr has hardly broken verbal stride. Speaking of his close loss last week to Missouri, Orr said Monday during the Big Eight coaches' teleconference, "We took a charge and blocked a shot and got neither of them."

Then referring to his game at Oklahoma State last week, Orr said, "My kid gets knocked down, and they call a foul on my kid and change the entire complexion of the game. It killed our rally entirely. I tell you, I haven't said much. But I'm getting sick and tired of some of the things that are happening to my team at the end of these games."

Orr even seemed to indicate that Missouri guard Anthony Peeler, who scored 42 points in a brilliant performance at Iowa State, may have been aided by poor officiating.

"He was sensational. He was great," Orr said. "But if you're going to charge all the time, you can be pretty good, coach."

Later in his interview Orr returned to the subject once more.

"We've played good basketball the last 5-6 weeks," he said. "We haven't been the entire cause of all our problems. We've had some very, very strange things happen in these games."

On another controversy, Coach Billy Tubbs took issue with reports that William Davis had been suspended for Oklahoma's game Saturday at Kansas. Davis, Oklahoma's No. 2 scorer and No. 1 rebounder, did not make the trip and the Sooners lost by 11.

"That is a team matter that I am handling," Tubbs said. "The word came out over the press that he has been suspended one game. That's not true. We were never talking suspension for the Kansas game."

However, Tubbs did not say how much longer one of his best players will sit out, or why.

"I'm not going to be rushed into anything. I'm not in a time limit," he said. "We'll do what's right for everybody concerned. I will not be rushed by the press into making announcements and decisions."

"Let's put it this way — officially, it is an attitude situation that has to be handled. I'll handle it according to what I want to do with it."

Peeler, top-ranked Missouri's 6-4 sophomore guard, is emerging as one of the finest players in the country. He has averaged more than 25 points a game since the Tigers' went to No. 1 two weeks ago and his game at Iowa State, which included 20-of-20 from the free throw line, two steals, five assists and nine rebounds was spectacular.

When the experts were making their pre-season predictions last fall, only one man paid much more than polite lip service to Kansas — Oklahoma State's Leonard Hamilton.

"I still expect some strange things to happen," he said of the conference race. "Missouri looks awful good right now. But I've learned to expect the unexpected in our conference. I can't believe the rest of the season will finish like it is now. Nothing would surprise me because on any given night, anybody's capable of winning."

Teaberry leaps to NCAA heights

By Dan Wicker
Sports Reporter

It is always a dream for a college athlete to qualify for the most respected and important meet of the year — the NCAA Championships, and Saturday at Champaign, Ill., high jumper Connie Teaberry fell just short of the qualifying mark of 6-0 1/4.

Teaberry did reach the provisional qualifying mark by clearing 5-11, and should too few athletes qualify, then the field will be opened further, and Teaberry could be on her way to the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships in Indianapolis, Ind., March 9-10.

The K-State sophomore achieved her season-best mark in winning the Dominio's Pizza-Illini Classic at the University of Illinois.

And Teaberry, a native of St. Louis, has plenty of time to reach the automatic qualifying mark by the time the indoor season ends. K-State will compete in three more meets, and should she need it, Teaberry would also have a chance to compete at a last-chance qualifying meet.

Teaberry, who placed third at the Big Eight Indoor Championships and won the conference's outdoor competition, also qualified for the NCAA's last season, but she failed to make the finals.

Coach John Capriotti said Teaberry is ahead of her progress from last year in meeting the provisional qualifying mark for nationals in only the third meet of the season.

"She is a lot better than last year. At this time she was jumping 5-7 and 5-8," Capriotti said. "She went 5-11 and had some real good attempts at 6-0 (Saturday)."

Teaberry said she is just as pleased with her jump as Capriotti, but realizes she is not close to where she wants to be at the end of the season. She knows there is room for improvement and needs to keep working.

"I feel real good, but I still have a long way to go," she said. "I can't stop there. There is so much more to be done."

Teaberry was excited when she cleared the provisional mark, but said she was not overly surprised.

"I really wasn't thinking about it. I was concentrating on clearing 6-0," she said.

Capriotti said he believes that Teaberry is going to improve as the season progresses.

"She jumps better sick than some people do healthy," Capriotti said, referring to the fact that Teaberry had the flu last week and just recovered before the meet.

Teaberry has set higher goals than just the 5-11 provisional mark

99 she cleared last Saturday. The guaranteed qualifying mark is set at 6-0 1/4, and Teaberry has set a goal of clearing 6-1 along with being in the top 6 high jumpers in the nation she said.

Capriotti said Teaberry is an ideal athlete to coach and have on a team.

"She is a good competitor and does not like to lose," Capriotti said. "She trains hard and consistently, and does everything she needs to do to be successful both on and off the track."

Teaberry's next attempt at the automatic qualifying mark will be Saturday at the Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb.

Bo won't hang up baseball

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Bo Jackson's agent moved quickly to quell rumors Monday, saying the outfielder-running back has no plans to quit baseball.

Jackson lost in salary arbitration over the weekend, making him only the 10th-highest paid member of the Kansas City Royals even though he led the team in home runs and RBIs and was MVP in the All-Star Game.

"There is no bitterness on Bo's part, and no change in Bo's football or baseball plans," agent Richard Woods said from his home in Mobile, Ala. "Bo accepts what happened and will go on."

Jackson, who also led the major leagues in RBI ratio, asked for $1,900,001 and the Royals offered $1 million — the biggest gap in arbitration history.

Arbitrator Steve Goldberg sided with the club. But baseball is actually the No. 3 money-maker in Jackson's unique sports portfolio. And speculation arose that the moody slugger, who gained almost 1,000 yards in a part-time role with the Los Angeles Raiders, would turn to football full time.

"One million dollars is still a lot of money," Woods said. "Business is business."

Jackson, who made more than $1 million last year from both football and commercial endorsements, was not available for comment. His Royals salary for 1989 was $610,000.

Royals' general manager John Schuerholz took sharp exception to reports that co-owner Ewing Kauffman had been responsible for the stalled negotiations.

"Richard probably has a sense of embarrassment about the fact that the whole case simply turned on the day he submitted the number," Schuerholz said. "Everybody who knows anything about the arbitration process, on either side, reacted the same way. We had agents suggest there's no way their side could win."

Woods said there was "a misunderstanding."

Wildcat athletics, columnist's opinions get into full swing

Scott Paske

Chalk Talk

The sports bag is loaded with good stuff today, and I'm loaded with opinions.

There isn't any better place to start than Big Eight Commissioner Carl James' decision to reprimand Wildcat coach Lon Kruger last Friday. Because James doesn't have the authority to do the same thing to me, I'll put it all on the line.

Mr. James, you screwed up. During my years as a Big Eight fan, I never thought I'd see this day. Kruger, the All-American guy from Silver Lake, was told to zip his lip regarding conference officials.

Billy Tubbs ought to be jealous.

As David Svoboda mentioned in his column Monday, Kruger's comments were more in defense of his players than an attack on officiating. Kruger was even a compassionate tattle-tale, refusing to mention names of the players/bad boys from Oklahoma who were involved in the incidents (my "bad boys" accusation is valid — OU guard Terrence Mullins admitted it).

But because we all know the weapons were Skeeter Henry's saliva and Jackie Jones' elbow, James' action against Kruger is ludicrous. The commissioner obviously stared at his "keep-your-mouth-shut-about-my-officials" policy too long, became dizzy and pointed the finger at the wrong coach.

The next time league referee J.C. Leimbach comes to town, ask him who makes his deodorant work harder during a game — Kruger or Tubbs?

Now that the Sooners have captured more of my attention than they deserve, I'll move on to other things. Any repeal of a reprimand isn't going to help the 'Cats stop their recent slide. For the first time in Kruger's tenure, the NCAA Tournament picture is looking dim.

Following Saturday's loss on the road to Nebraska, one sports scribe offered, "Stick a fork in the Kansas State Wildcats. They're just about done."

Even if K-State's postseason hopes are starting to appear in the form of three letters (NIT) instead of four, wouldn't it be nice to see the 'Cats shove that fork somewhere nasty into top-ranked Missouri on Thursday?

Speaking of the Tigers, Missouri's women handed the Lady Cats their first conference loss Sunday, 79-64, at Mizzou's Hearnes Center. But a tip of the hat to interim coach Gaye Griffin, who has done an admirable job since replacing Matilda Mossman five games into the season.

Griffin should be a front-running candidate for Big Eight Coach-of-the-Year, guiding the Lady Cats closer to their first NCAA Tournament bid since 1986-87 ...

Track coach John Capriotti took his team on the road during the weekend and brought back several top-three finishes. Several of Capriotti's cross-country runners stole the headlines, as the 'Cats swept the women's mile run, and finished 1-2 in the 3,000-meters ...

K-State's tennis team was a rude host over the weekend, blasting non-conference opponents Creighton and Southwest Missouri State. The 'Cats lost just one match and two sets in the two victories. Has Coach Steve Bie-tau created a monster? ...

Outside K-State's sports world, how about Sunday's Pro Bowl, won by the NFC 27-21? It looked like all the megabuck-making stars of the NFL actually cared about who won the game.

And thanks to superstars like John Elway not playing in the game, it gave Seattle quarterback Dave Krieg a chance to be the hero with a game-winning drive.

Sorry Dave, you ain't no Joe Montana.

For the oddballs of the week, enter boxers Jorge Paez and Hector Camacho. Paez shaved the Batman logo in the back of his head, while Camacho wears G-string boxing trunks. Draw your own conclusions.

ID cards' use increases

Vali-Dine system may go campus-wide

By Monica Marcotte
Collegian Reporter

Plans are proceeding for applying the new Vali-Dine system to campus use, but the process has been met with some resistance.

Garland Lewis, information processing director for housing, said the KSU Department of Housing is tentatively planning to install new locks this summer that will use the Vali-Dine system.

However, some Marlatt Hall residents are saying they have no need for the system.

"Marlatt has never locked the doors, and we have never had security problems in the past," said Dave Young, junior in journalism and mass communications. Young was previously president of Marlatt and one of the organizers for a petition against the Vali-Dine system.

"We are presenting an appeal to Student Senate on the cost effectiveness of the system," said John Ryan, freshman in secondary education. Ryan is a Marlatt resident and also one of the organizers of the petition.

Both men said the system would probably work well in a co-ed or women's residence hall, but they predicted problems with maintaining the security the system is supposed to provide.

"It would be easy for a group of people to get in on one person's ID card," Young said.

During early pre-enrollment in the fall, all students went through the process of having the magnetic strip ID cards encoded for Vali-Dine. The Vali-Dine system uses the magnetic strip on the back of the ID cards and the K-State Union Wildcat card for information collection and transactions.

The Vali-Dine system is already being used in residence hall cafeterias and in the K-State Union Bookstore for declining-balance transactions, rather than cash transactions, Registrar Don Foster said.

The Vali-Dine system is a software package with related hardware the University has leased from Griffin Technology, in Victor, N.Y. The contract is for a three-year lease on the hardware with an annual renewable fee, said Mike Hatch, Union coordinator for the Vali-Dine.

"The Vali-Dine system is very prevalent on the East Coast, and the University of Kansas is using it in its residence halls as well," he said.

Start-up costs for the system, which are being shared by the housing department and the Union, were estimated at $120,000. Annual maintenance costs are expected to run $80,000, Hatch said.

The Union has about 6,000 Wildcat accounts. The cards can be used at the bookstore, the copy center, the recreation center and the cafeteria. They can also be used for any event sponsored by the Union Program Council and at the information desk.

An account can be opened with a minimum deposit of $5 at the K-State Union business office or the check-cashing window. The account works on the declining balance principle, Hatch said.

The University forsee the card being used for several applications around campus, Foster said. The Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex will probably be the next to install the system, he said.

Gardens benefit Jardine families; plot sign-up deadline March 6

By Angela Tholstrup
Collegian Reporter

Ripe juicy tomatoes, fresh cucumbers, pungent herbs and other vegetables will be growing in garden plots by Jardine Terrace Apartments.

Sign-up for garden plots started Monday and runs through March 6 at the Pittman Building. The gardening program is sponsored by Jardine Mayor's Council.

The program was started in 1969, and continues to be successful, said Susanne Tunstall, Family Housing Coordinator. Last year about 110 families participated in the program and used all of the plots.

Participants must have a current K-State student identification card and reside in Jardine for the entire summer.

A $2 fee per plot is charged, Tunstall said. A family can sign up for one or two plots initially, and purchase any other plots available after the deadline.

"Sometimes families sign up next to each other so as to have a larger space where they can grow more things," she said. "They share by planting it together."

The garden plots are located behind Jardine buildings Q and X. Plots are 8 feet by 15 feet. There are 57 plots in the Q garden, and 144 plots in the X garden, Tunstall said.

Housing maintenance plows, fertilizes and tills in the spring, said

Jackie Toburen, grounds maintenance supervisor. She said the soil is tilled and fertilized before March 17 and plowed between Halloween and Thanksgiving.

Housing supplies water for the garden. The $2 fee pays for maintenance of the two hydrants at the Q garden and the five at the X. However, watering cans are preferred so as not to tie up the hydrants, Tunstall said.

Housing encourages the gardeners to mulch in order to cut down on water loss, and water at night one or two times a week.

Pesticides cannot be used unless authorization is obtained from the Mayor's Council. The Mayor's Council and Housing Maintenance will decide if the pesticide can be used, she said.

Extension gardening and pesticide brochures will be made available this semester in Jardine washhouses, Tunstall said. Brochures are also available in Umberger 24.

Gardeners may lose planting privileges by not planting by May 15, letting children damage other gardens, abandoning the plot, neglecting the plot or not having plot properly staked and identified. The forfeited plots may be reassigned.

State statutes require candidates for public office to submit a list outlining their substantial financial interests of more than $1,000 at least 10 weeks before elections, said Riley County election officials. Candidates are also required to update these records within 10 days of a change in their financial status.

Kaup said many private businessmen, including attorneys, would be unwilling to run for office if they were required to release information concerning clientele and billing.

"You are certainly going to discourage some professional people from running for office," Kaup said. "It could also affect insurance salesman and a lot of other people who are self-employed."

Joe Knopp, a Manhattan attorney and former Kansas House majority leader, said legislation requiring candidates to list all customers or clients when filing would be cumbersome and difficult to interpret.

"An interpretation like this will have a chilling effect on the number of people who have these types of interests," Knopp said. "This applies to not only elected, but to appointed officials as well."

Knopp, who represents Nancy Denning, said he could not comment on the her case while it is pending.

Mayor Kent Glasscock said no amount of paperwork can compensate for integrity in government, because, "at some point you either have integrity or you don't."

"The thing we have to watch is a system so cumbersome that people don't have time to serve because they're filling out all the damn paperwork," Glasscock said.

Although supportive of financial disclosure laws, Glasscock said he does not want to "create an environment that precludes" qualified people from seeking public office.

With fewer professionals seeking office, voters may see a greater range in the ages of candidates filing for office, Kaup said.

Although there is "nothing wrong with having a cross section of people running for office," there will be those, "who do not have the experience," Klingler said.

Glasscock agreed. "We don't want totally uninvolved people running government," Glasscock said.

Although Romzek believes the numbers of qualified candidates filing is generally decreasing, she does not expect the age-group of the candidates to shift.

"I don't think it will change demographically," she said.

Romzek said the current laws have two goals: to help public officials avoid a conflict of interest prior to taking office and at the same time avoid the occasion of appearance of a conflict of interest.

"Students ought to be paying for the extras," he said.

Kern agreed with Johnson.

"We ended up paying for the renovation of Holton Hall, and we really didn't have to," Kern said. "The state should pay for a library addition."

Robert Krause, vice president of institutional advancement, said the bond and library are separate issues. "There would have to be a referendum to be able to change the fees to give the money to the library," he said.

The amount of money paid toward the bond issue depends on the enrollment figures for a given semester. Thomas Schellhardt, acting vice president for administration and finance, said each student pays $22 per semester toward the bond issue, which means a total of about $850,000 to $900,000 this semester.

University Controller Keith Ratzloff said the bonds have been grouped into the Student Fee Refunding Bond Issue. President Jon Wefald has the final say on what will happen to the fee after the bond is paid.

Johnson, who will serve as chair of the task force, said he is in the process of finding members.

Ray Robel, director of Rec Services, said the task force would consist of students from each living group, faculty and administrators.

Robel said an addition to the Rec Complex is a project that needs attention.

"Each year the number of people using the Rec Complex increases," Robel said. "Last year, 78 percent of the people at K-State were involved in a rec service program. I think that speaks highly of our program's usefulness."

Robel said the ideal addition to the Rec Complex would involve adding four more indoor basketball courts to the south of the complex and redesigning much of the existing structure.

"We're talking about an addition that would cost in the neighborhood of $3.5 million to $4 million," he said. "The need has been there and the need has increased. It's something that has been a long time coming."

Hobrock said a common argument for a Rec Complex addition centers on the 400,000 students who use it each year.

"We have over 800,000 exits from the library each year," he said. "That's more than twice the traffic at the Rec Center."

"It's a strange time to be discussing a Rec Center addition and a library addition simultaneously."

He said the time to prevent burglaries and murders is while the child is an infant.

"If you feed them, care for them, play with them, educate them and love them, then there's not going to be all that crime — it's not going to occur," he said. "If it doesn't occur, then you don't need those penitentiaries."

"But you see, kids don't vote," Floyd Dorsey said, "so a legislator, he's going to sit up there and he's going listen to the people who do vote and the people that make the greatest donations to his campaign."

"They're the ones he's going to listen to the closest," he said. "Kids don't make donations for campaigns. Kids don't vote. Kids are powerless."

Dean Randolph Pohlman, college of business administration, announced his resignation Tuesday.

Business dean resigns Pohlman takes position with Koch Industries

By Tomari Guinn
Staff Reporter

Randolph Pohlman, dean of the College of Business Administration, announced his resignation Tuesday. Pohlman has accepted the position of director of employee development with Koch Industries in Wichita. His duties will include corporate and executive training, handling employee personnel matters and business consulting.

"Koch Industries is a growing company with excellent people," he said. "It's the challenge of starting from scratch."

An offer was made by Koch Industries on Saturday, and Pohlman accepted on Monday. The news came as a complete shock to his staff. "I tried to express my appreciation of all their support in the past five years," Pohlman said. "I think K-State has been a fun place to work, and I'll miss it."

He said the announcement of his resignation came early because he didn't want to put people in awkward situations that might occur later down the road.

"It really bothers me to know something and have to act like I don't," Pohlman said. "I've always been very open and wanted to give people an opportunity to plan for the future."

Pohlman said during his administration, the college has received accounting accreditation, undergone renovations and installed a micro-computing lab that has resulted in a better environment for the students and staff.

Pohlman said he will leave the University a program that is one of the best in the area.

"I firmly believe that we are the finest business school in the state of Kansas," he said.

Pohlman said he would remain at the University through April 21 for the kickoff for the $100-million Essential Edge Campaign.

"I plan to make as much money for the campaign as possible between now and the time I leave," he said.

Foul play, suicide ruled out in fire

By Lori Mikesell
Staff Reporter

The cause of the fire that killed William Patton, junior in electrical engineering, is still unknown, said Capt. Al Raynor of the Riley County Police Department.

Patton's remains were found by a Manhattan Country Club groundskeeper in a burned-up, four-wheel-drive vehicle on a remote service road near the tee-off area of hole 17 early Saturday.

RCPD officials have ruled out foul play and suicide. Raynor said the fire was most likely started by some sort of mechanical malfunction.

Based on flashpoint patterns of the fire, police believe the fire started under the vehicle, near the catalytic converter, Raynor said.

"I highly doubt that we will ever know what started the fire. Any possibilities at this point would be purely speculation on my part," he said.

Based on the amount of ice and snow covering the vehicle, Raynor said, RCPD officials believe the fire started sometime between

Hayden vetoes portions of bill

Governor reluctantly signs restoration of general welfare, MediKan funding

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. Mike Hayden used his line item veto power Tuesday night to veto part of a bill restoring welfare cuts, eliminating restoration of a $9 a month per person reduction in Aid to Families with Dependent Children and funding for the Attendant Care for Independent Living program.

The AFDC restoration amounted to $1.27 million in state general fund spending and the ACIL restoration, $371,448. Those funds would have been matched by about $2 million in funds from other sources, including federal funds.

Hayden left intact the restoration of $10.2 million in spending to restore cuts in other welfare programs, including MediKan and General Assistance.

In his veto message, the governor said he signed the remaining parts of the bill reluctantly.

"My reluctance is based on the fact that the Legislature has not developed a solution to the rapidly escalating welfare budget," Hayden said. "The legislative leadership has asked that I sign the bill to allow them time to review the problem."

Hayden had recommended a series of cuts in the current budget of welfare programs to help the state Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services deal with a projected $34 million shortfall in the budgets of some programs. In essence, he proposed taking money from some programs and giving it to others.

However, his proposals received heavy criticism from social welfare advocates and legislators who said they would hurt the most vulnerable population in Kansas.

"I'm disappointed," said Senate Minority Leader Michael Johnston, D-Parsons. "But I'm pleased the governor saw fit to leave the bulk of the changes in place. I hope it shows a willingness to continue the dialogue."

Republican legislative leaders had backed Hayden's proposed cuts, saying they were necessary given the state's tight fiscal situation.

"I'm disappointed," said Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Shawnee, chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee. "I believe he should have vetoed the whole bill."

Johnston said he expects the Senate to attempt to override the vetoes. In fact, he said he expects the attempt to come from the chamber's Republican leaders, who think they have the votes to sustain Hayden.

A motion to override a veto takes a two-thirds vote in each chamber, or 27 of 40 votes in the Senate and 84 of 125 votes in the House.

Speaker says hazing weakens, demoralizes

By Ingrid Erickson
Collegian Reporter

Hazing is demeaning, dangerous, illegal and weakens the structure of greek organizations, said Dave Westol, executive director of Theta Chi fraternity.

Westol spoke to about 300 members of greek organizations, including members of the University of Kansas Theta Chi pledge class Tuesday night in McCain Auditorium. The lecture was titled "Through Ignorance We Haze, Educate Your Chapter."

Westol created a hypothetical situation that covered a young man's pledging a fraternity, his indoctrination to "hell week", and the torturous hazing that resulted in his death. He also discussed the legal proceedings that would follow.

"I feel nothing but rage when I hear about hazing incidents," Westol said. "The law looks at your actions, not the victims."

He said greek organizations that haze cite the following reasons for their actions: "pledges need to show some unity," "it really isn't hazing," or "it feels good when you're an active."

But Westol said, "Try telling a judge why you haze and see how stupid you sound."

"There is no honesty or truthfulness in a chapter that hazes, no brotherhood or sisterhood," he said.

In Westol's hypothetical hazing scene, Mike, a pledge, often asked his big brother, John, what to expect during hell week. John always responded with, "It's a secret, Mike."

When members of Mike's pledge class asked active why they had to use the back door to enter the house, why they had to answer the phone in three rings and why they had to clean up empty pizza boxes and beer cans after parties, they were always told, "You just have to go through it once, and then you can hassle the new pledges. It's a great system."

During hell week, Mike's pledge class underwent physically and emotionally demeaning rituals. The pledges wore burlap bags, were not allowed to shower for three days, and had to kiss the fraternity crest on the floor through shaving cream while active blew cigar smoke in their faces and banged pots and pans.

Later, Mike died on the floor. He was intoxicated and had choked on his own vomit. Other pledges were shoved away when they tried to assist Mike. John was tried on charges of involuntary manslaughter.

"The jury doesn't understand greeks," Westol said. "They see that a fine young man has died, and you can't say why. Hazing is a product of the ego, our dark side."

Westol said he often asks a fraternity or sorority if they are willing to have the parents of a pledge sit in on initiation practices.

He said 17 Theta Chi chapters are on probation for hazing. In Virginia, Westol revoked a Theta Chi's charter for two years because pledges were required to act like animals on the fraternity lawn. He said his only regret was that it took seven days to revoke the charter.

Westol, a Theta Chi alumnus from Western Michigan University, said Mike's story represented his own initiation experiences with the excep-Nikki, an exotic dancer from Kansas City, stretches before taking the stage Tuesday night at Baystreet in Aggieville.

By Heather Anderson
Collegian Reporter

Strippers performing in Aggieville may have provided a special night out for the audience, but it was just another show for the dancers.

Elite Male, a troupe of male strippers, entertained Monday night, and Obsession, female strippers, performed Tuesday night at Baystreet.

Because male stripping evolved in the 1980s, the concept evokes mixed emotions from other men, ranging from confusion about the strippers' sexuality to hostility.

"(Men) feel threatened by us," Jesse Coleman, male stripper, said. "They're jealous. They want to be the ones doing it. Any guy would want to have hundreds of girls screaming for him. That's just the way guys are."

Coleman said the reaction they get from people makes the strippers defensive, causing them to "cop an attitude."

"We keep to ourselves," he said.

These male strippers consider performing their livelihood. Most of the men interviewed said they don't have another job.

"What other job do you get paid to enjoy yourself and have fun?" Coleman said.

Coleman is from a small town, and although many people from his hometown don't approve of his work, he said it doesn't matter to him.

"Some of them like it, some of them don't," he said. "I really don't care."

"Hey, it's legal, and it's a legitimate job," Coleman said. "You see guys on the beach in little Speedo bikini trunks; we're in the same thing, only a little smaller."

The strippers' girlfriends at home seem to not be threatened

Taking it off Exotic dancers at local bars view stripping as profession

by the nature of the men's work.

"They understand," Kirk McCammond, stripper, said. "As long as we're home at a decent hour, and they know where we're at."

While the men referred to themselves as actors, the women preferred to be called dancers.

As a bar full of anxious men waited for the show to begin, dancer Aubrey was concerned about her clothes.

"Keep an eye on your clothing," Aubrey said to the other dancers, who arrived late and had to rush to get dressed.

"Be sure to drop it to the back of the stage, because the guys like to take them home for souvenirs," she said.

Although the public doesn't seem to consider female strippers as controversial as male strippers, their performances are often considered to be less professional.

"People say to get a real job," New York Nikki, dancer, said. "This is a real job. We work long hours, we invest in expensive clothes, and we make a good living."

Nikki, who preferred to withhold her last name, was a professional dancer in New York before a serious knee injury forced her to quit dancing. She moved to Missouri to pursue a career in theatrical makeup and design, but found her talent wasn't in sufficient demand to make a living.

"I was working as a check-out girl in a supermarket, and a friend of mine suggested I do this, and I said 'no way, I could never do that,'" Nikki said.

But then I thought of it as a job opportunity, and I decided I was crazy to let it pass," she said. "I can make as much money now in one night as I could have made all week before."

Liz, a farm girl from Minnesota, met an exotic dancer during a college bowling tournament and eventually became a stripper herself.

"My parents don't know," she said. "I could never tell them."

Aubrey said her parents aren't as disapproving as they are disappointed.

Session extended to third day

MOSCOW (AP) — Communist Party leaders added an unexpected third day to their pivotal meeting Tuesday and sent Mikhail S. Gorbachev back to the drawing board to fill in holes in his blueprint for ending the party's monopoly on power.

The extension of the party session, which was supposed to end Tuesday, was a clear sign of the controversy generated by Gorbachev's proposals to revamp the country's political structure.

Central Committee sources said most speakers agreed with Gorbachev's proposal that the party's monopoly on power, enshrined in the Soviet Constitution, must end.

"All unanimously think it has become obsolete. It has no meaning," Central Committee member Vladimir P. Anishev told reporters who gathered outside the Kremlin's Spassky Gate to await news. The session was closed to journalists.

However, partial transcripts of two days of the session, in which 51 speakers took the floor, indicated that neither radical reformers nor hard-liners were satisfied with Gorbachev's proposal.

Kennel fined for dead dogs

LONDON (AP) — A magistrate Tuesday fined a British kennel $22,100 for the deaths of 79 beagles it was shipping to a Swedish pharmaceutical firm.

The dogs suffocated in a truck trailer aboard the ferry Tor Britannia in the North Sea on Sept. 5.

Perrycroft Farm Kennels, which breeds animals for scientific research, had pleaded guilty to two charges of causing unnecessary suffering to 100 beagles during the 24-hour ferry trip from Harwich, England to Goteborg, Sweden.

The 8-month-old beagles were being shipped to the Astra pharmaceutical company in Sodertalje, south of Stockholm, for use in testing drugs, said Astra spokesman Staffan Temby.

Five hours after the vessel left Harwich the truck driver, Henry Stevens, found that only 21 beagles were alive, and 10 of them unconscious.

The temperature in the container was 95 degrees Fahrenheit, Swedish police said.

House passes vote proposal

WASHINGTON (AP) — The House passed legislation Tuesday making it easier for Americans to register to vote by establishing automatic registration for people obtaining drivers' licenses and procedures to register by mail.

Originally sculpted as a bipartisan measure, a party-line dispute erupted last week after the Bush administration objected that the legislation would increase the risk of voter fraud and prove expensive for states to implement. But majority Democrats were joined by Republicans who backed their leader and the measure was approved 289-132.

Minutes earlier, the chamber defeated on a 291-129 vote a Republican leadership alternative offered by Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., making the new procedures voluntary and providing $120 million to help states boost their voter registration efforts.

The measure must still be considered by the Senate.

"Our campaigns are too long; they're too expensive; they alienate potential voters," said House Minority Leader Bob Michel, R-Ill. "If you want more people to vote, then we should run more stimulating and competitive campaigns."

Rep. Al Swift, D-Wash., a sponsor of the so-called motor voter bill, said Michel's substitute would "gut" the legislation.

Jury ruling says town smells

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — The nose knows without any help from the legal system, but a grand jury report tells residents what they know already:

Jacksonville smells. The grand jury issued the report on June 14, 1988, but it had been sealed as two paper mills and two chemical plants criticized in the report challenged it in court. The four companies say they have taken expensive steps to eliminate smelly emissions.

"I don't think we need a grand jury to tell us Jacksonville smells," said Dick Kennedy, a frequent critic of the city's pollution policies.

"I don't think anybody should be put out of business, but I think they should stay out of court and spend their money cleaning up the air," said Kennedy, who said he lives downwind from the two paper mills.

After months of court challenges, Chief Circuit Judge John E. Santora ordered the report released Monday evening.

Doctor charged with theft

WAKEENEY (AP) — A physician who lives in a farm near Collyer was charged Tuesday in Trego County District Court with burglary, theft and possession of marijuana.

Dr. Neal E. Berner was charged with two counts of Class D felony burglary, one count of misdemeanor possession of marijuana and three counts of misdemeanor theft, said Trego County Attorney Paul Oller.

Berner, who has been a resident of Trego County for about 15 years, was not currently in active practice. In a November letter to the Western Kansas World, he said he had closed his clinic due to financial problems.

According to an affidavit signed by Sheriff J.D. Ochs, a search at Berner's residence found several items that had been reported stolen.

During the search, an underground tunnel that led to a locked room was found. According to the affidavit, searchers found six plants alleged to be marijuana, growing lights, storage tanks, pumps, fertilizer and growing equipment, all in an underground bunker.

Man convicted of murder

TOPEKA (AP) — A young man was convicted of first-degree murder Tuesday in the death of his infant stepson last year.

Jurors who got the case against Mark A. Hupp on Monday afternoon returned a verdict Tuesday morning after deliberating less than five hours. Hupp, 21, will be sentenced March 9 by Shawnee County District Judge Matthew Dowd. The charge carries a mandatory life prison term, with eligibility for parole after 15 years.

Hupp was found guilty in the death of 3-month-old Michael A. Cloud. The child died last Sept. 28 of brain trauma which the coroner said resulted from a "blunt-type blow" to the head.

Hupp testified Monday that the baby wiggled out of his grasp and fell. Prosecution witnesses said the baby could not have died from such a fall, and that he more likely was struck on the head.

During the deliberations, jurors asked to hear again portions of the testimony of Dr. Wike Scamman, the county coroner, and Debra Hupp, the child's mother.

In July, the child was temporarily removed from the Hupp home after unexplained bruises were found on his shoulder. After a time in foster care, he was returned home by court order.

Skipp Wefald interested in flying

By Donna Warren
Collegian Reporter

Even though his father is the president of the University, Skipp Wefald, sophomore in history and son of President Jon Wefald, said he never felt any pressure to attend K-State.

"I really didn't consider anywhere else," Skipp Wefald said. Wefald said he chose K-State because he was happy here in Manhattan. He said many of his friends were planning to attend K-State, and he liked what the school had to offer.

Wefald said his parents wanted him to choose a good school, but they let him decide which university to attend.

He said his younger brother, Andy, a senior at Manhattan High School, is thinking about attending Iowa State University next year.

Jon Wefald said he supports his children's decisions. He said he believes parents should help their children see the options available, but the decision itself should be made entirely by the child.

Wefald doesn't live at home. Both he and his parents thought it would be better for him to move out in order to meet other students and get the full "college experience."

Wefald said his mother, Ruth Ann, felt it was important for him to move into a structured environment and was happy when he decided to join the Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity.

Wefald's pledge dad, Perry Palmer, senior in landscape architecture, said the house rushed him because he met the requirements they look for in potential members, not

Christopher T. Assaf/Staff

There was never any pressure on Skipp Wefald, sophomore in history, to attend K-State, even though he is the son of President Jon Wefald. He chose K-State because he liked what it had to offer.

because he is the president's son.

"Skipp was rushed by our house because he had good grades, was good in sports, was active, outgoing. He's a well-rounded individual," Palmer said.

One of Wefald's main interests is flying. He works for Spicer Aircraft as a lineman and has had his pilot's license for almost a year.

He said his interest in flying began when he lived in Marshall, Minn. His best friend's father owned the local airport. Wefald and his friend would ride their bikes to the airport where they would wash and fuel airplanes, he said.

When his family moved to Manhattan, Wefald got a job at Capitol Airlines. After they went out of business, he joined Spicer Aircraft, he said.

He used the money he earned working for the aircraft company to pay for flying lessons to get his pilot's license. Wefald said he's glad he did this since it gave him the chance to do something on his own.

"After graduation, I'd like to go into the Air Force or the National Guard," he said.

Some of his other interests include playing intramural football and basketball. He also spends a lot of time waterskiing. He said he tries to go waterskiing every day during the summer if possible.

Wefald is currently seeking his bachelor's degree in history.

He said he chose history because it "seemed like the most interesting thing and it kind of rubbed off since my dad has a Ph.D. in history."

Wefald said after a few years in the "real world," he might return to school to get his master's degree or a job as a pilot.

Wefald said his parents do not pressure him to excel in his classes, because they know he will always try to do the best he can.

He also said he doesn't feel any pressure to be the perfect son. He said if he ever did get into trouble, it would be between his parents and him.

"I know my mom and dad well enough to say they just care about me and wouldn't care what other people think," Wefald said. "It would be our problem and no one else's."

Wefald said being the president's son has many advantages. He said he has the opportunity to go to the Orange Bowl every year. He said they usually make a family vacation out of the trip, stopping to see his grandmother in Tampa Bay, Fla.

He said he has also had the chance to meet a lot of people, including most of the Landon Lecturers.

Another benefit is having his parents' house on campus, he said. He parks his car there sometimes when he drives to campus for class. He said he also stops by home sometimes for a snack between classes.

Wefald said he doesn't see any disadvantages to being the president's son.

"Education is the Core of Our Future" is the theme of the College of Education's third annual education symposium today in the K-State Union.

It is open to students from all majors who are interested in education, said Laura Riblett, chairwoman of the symposium presenters' committee.

"Our promotion has been aimed at everyone, including students in Ag Education and Music Education," Riblett said.

Students may attend five sessions out of 17 offered from 8 a.m. through 3 p.m.

The sessions cover current topics in education such as "The Changing Image of Teaching," "Parent Involvement" and "Human Sexuality Education in the 90's."

The presentations will be made by guest speakers including a social worker, coaches, teachers, a counselor and an architect, Riblett said.

Students plan and run the symposium, she said.

The symposium committees have been working on the symposium since the summer, said Julie Barta, chairwoman of the symposium registration committee.

Topic areas were chosen from response forms completed after past symposiums. "Two of the biggest issues now facing the educational field are children at risk and school board policy mandating sex education in schools," Riblett said.

"Previous sessions were laid-back, covered many different views, and were inspiring," Barta said.

This year's theme was chosen to go with the new decade. "We are coming out as teachers in a new decade, we want people to be broad-based," Riblett said.

Each session will be videotaped. She said the videos will be used for K-State Open House and other promotional activities.

Lunch is from 11:30 to 1 p.m. and features live entertainment by the Manhattan Pops Choir, said Nancy Decker, chairperson of the symposium luncheon committee. Certificates will be given to the speakers during lunch.

Registration begins at 7:30 a.m. in the Union. Students must pay a $10 fee at registration.

Anorexia, bulimia afflict students

February is National Eating Disorders Month. This week is Eating Disorder Week at the University.

"Eating disorders affect at least 25 percent of the students at K-State," said Cindy Burke, director of health education at Lafene Student Health Center. Lafene is sponsoring Eating Disorder Week.

Eating disorders include anorexia nervosa, a severe form of self-starvation; bulimia, a syndrome involving bingeing and purging; the use of laxatives or an unhealthy preoccupation with exercise; and overeating, said Wendy Summerhill, senior in biology.

Summerhill was a patient at Menorah Medical Center in Kansas City, Mo. in 1984 and again in 1985. Theresa Youngworth, senior in family life and community service, was at the same hospital in 1985 and 1987.

"Nationally, 25-30 percent of the general population is affected by some sort of eating disorder," Burke said.

Having an eating disorder really has nothing to do with the food, Youngworth said. It has to do with the person being a perfectionist and a feeling of being out of control.

"I would try to be a perfect daughter, a perfect student in school, a perfect friend and I had a hard time dealing with anger," Summerhill said.

"There was always so much competition and I always wanted to be more than average, because it is not OK to be average," Youngworth said.

"My parents forced me to go in for help," she said. "When I was admitted, I saw how bad it could really get and didn't want it to happen to me."

Eating disorders are like alcoholism because the victim usually denies the problem.

People with eating disorders may seem to be self-assured, but deep inside they are dying and don't realize it, Youngworth said.

Once the individual has been admitted to the problem, the person has to want to get well for themselves, not for anyone else. Parents should be understanding and willing to offer support and ask how they can help, she said.

"Even now when I do something bad, I feel I should hurt myself or go make myself sick, but a little voice inside my head tells me not to," Youngworth said.

Today's events for Eating Disorder Week will focus on how family and friends deal with and facilitate the recovery of victims of eating disorders, Summerhill said. A discussion group will meet at 7 p.m. in Room 213 of the K-State Union.

EDITORIAL

Eating disorders complex, dangerous

This week, Feb. 5-9, is Eating Disorders Awareness Week. Eating disorders are categorized into three general groupings with distinct symptoms and behavior. Anorexics exhibit a severe preoccupation with body, weight and dieting and control their weight by means of self-starvation.

Bulimics also exhibit a severe preoccupation with weight, appearance and dieting, but they attempt to control their weight by bingeing and purging their food.

Bulimic-anorexics exhibit a crossover of eating-disordered behavior, starving themselves, and purging themselves when and if food is ingested. Laxatives and diet pills can be also used as a means of preventing weight gain. Exercise can be abused too, as a means of burning calories, to shape one's body, and provide a sense of control and accomplishment. In fact, the struggle to control one's body, weight and hunger is a common struggle among all three eating disorders.

Wendy Summerhill, a senior in pre-medicine and a recovering anorexic, remembers her life being out of control as the trigger that began her struggle with anorexia.

"I started dieting and exercising excessively at 14. I felt totally out of control. I didn't feel that I was a good enough athlete, student... I was a perfectionist." Wendy still is a perfectionist but she claims to recover, "you have to give up a little perfectionism."

Most eating disorders begin with a desire to control and to be perfect. The images of women within the media contribute to the increasing number of women affected by eating disorders. Being slender and toned seem to be imperative and essential to be a successful woman.

Wendy said, "It's a combination of the cultural pressures and the woman's own personality that lead to the onset of an eating disorder."

But not everyone can be thin, and no one can be perfect. This checklist of appropriate behavior and appearance can be quite debilitating, for self-hate, self-preoccupation, and self-harm can surround and darken women's self-esteem and identity.

But what of the one percent of eating disorders in this country that are diagnosed within males? Men are not immune to these standards of beauty, but yet are not defined as readily by their weight and appearance.

Getting in shape for men usually means "pumping up," gaining weight and improving athletic skills. While for women, getting in shape usually means losing weight and controlling our naturally endowed curves. But men who struggle with an eating disorder should not be forgotten.

More research and more sharing needs to occur to discover why eating disorders occur mostly within women, and why they do occur within a small population of men.

Cindy Burke, director of Health Education at Lafene Student Health Center, said eating disorders affect at least 25 percent of students. But the cultural imperatives that insist upon proper diet, proper body fat percentage and proper amount of exercise affect and influence all students.

Dieting itself has been said to be an eating disorder. Dieting creates a vulnerability that may lead women to binge because of severe hunger. The bodily harm caused by chronic dieting is hidden. What may appear to be a healthy, slim physique may in fact be created and maintained by compulsive calorie counting, purging, laxative abuse, and excessive exercise.

Women and men who expend time and energy controlling and perfecting their appearance are trapped in a pattern of behavior they feel will ensure social acceptance. This is a lie. Women and men will never be satisfied with themselves and their bodies until either perfection is attained (which is impossible) or one's sense of self transcends such criteria as appropriate appearance and weight.

Wendy said she hopes to go on to medical school so she can spread the message that eating disorders are not glamorous. She also wants to provide herself as a role model to others struggling with weight, food and low self-esteem.

"When I was in the hospital, I had a hard time finding hope, for there was no one there who had recovered from an eating disorder. I wanted to see someone and talk to someone who had recovered. I needed someone to provide hope. Now I want to do this for someone else," she said.

Eating Disorders Awareness Week will provide such an opportunity for Wendy. She helped coordinate this week to foster discussion and to heighten awareness of this issue.

This week will also provide the opportunity for students to discuss and reflect not only upon eating disorders, but also upon this culture's standards of beauty and expectations of perfection.

It seems a shame so much time and energy is wasted on the superficial qualities of our personhood. It seems such a shame women and men have to restrict and harm themselves to feel acceptable, to feel attractive, to feel OK. It seems such a shame in this time of supposed liberation, women and men are still restrained and contained by our preoccupation with body, appearance and weight.

State bill complicates fetal life controversy

The miracle of life has been lost in the confusion caused by debates involving abortion, artificial insemination, frozen embryos, surrogate mothers and who will decide when life begins.

A new proposal promises to further complicate the debate.

Legislation has been proposed that would allow criminal charges to be filed against someone who kills or harms a fetus with violence. The bill also applies to fetuses killed in car accidents, but does not apply in the case of abortion.

This proposal needs to be more clearly defined before it will be deserving of serious consideration.

Some advocates of this legislation are pushing for a full range of crimes involving fetuses, from first-degree murder to assault. Under this bill, a driver who hits an expectant mother, killing the baby but not the woman, could be charged with vehicular homicide.

Ironically, killing an unborn child in the name of abortion is legal, while accidentally killing a fetus in a car accident is punishable with a prison sentence. Does the value of a fetus' life change depending on the circumstances of the death?

And what defines a 'violent' death. This vague description would for some include abortion.

Advocates of the proposal argue it is not an abortion issue, but feasibly situations will arise where the distinction between the violent death of a fetus and abortion will overlap under clouded circumstances.

If a pregnant woman, who has not yet decided whether to keep her baby, is beaten by her husband, causing a miscarriage, would the legislation apply?

Is it then the woman's decision to prosecute? Can she say, "No, I was planning to have an abortion, don't prosecute?"

Assuming the mother outlives the violent event, this legislation gives her incredible power.

Another problem with the proposed legislation is it crosses over into the dilemma of when life begins for a fetus.

Will it apply to fetuses from the day of conception or only those past their first trimester? Must the fetuses be considered viable? If the death of a fetus is called murder under this bill, the fetus is being considered a person.

This determination assumes the answer to a question the medical profession and lawmakers have yet to solve — When life begins.

This bill needs specific guidelines to cover these unanswered questions. It also lacks sound theory as to what distinguishes a violent death from the abortion issue and the question of when life begins.

If this legislation is intended to protect the rights of a guaranteed life, this goal should be evident in its design. Until then, this bill is not ready for consideration by the Kansas Legislature.

Don't read Bush's lips

The next technological advancement that needs to be made is a lying lip detector — a handy item to be used to whenever George Bush tells us to "read my lips."

Recently, Bush has shown he has completely forgotten many of his campaign promises, or at least his lips have. In 1988, he made a speech on a boat in the middle of Boston Harbor, complaining that Michael Dukakis was weak on the environment and was to blame for the harbor's pollution problems. But in the first real budget of his own, Bush cut $20 million slated for the clean-up of the harbor.

Dukakis was incensed by this news and called Bush a "fraud." The less-than-charismatic Massachusetts governor had often accused Bush of misleading the people on the Boston Harbor issue, saying it was a lack of federal funding that stalled the clean-up effort.

Bush's lips were lying. We read them and they said they would clean up Boston Harbor. So who is lying — George Bush or his lips? Another recent lie: Bush, or at least Bush's lips, promised to do something about the greenhouse effect. But at a recent international conference on global warming, he cautioned against enacting any immediate controls until we are sure it is a real problem.

That's funny. In August, 1988, Bush was talking about the greenhouse effect as though it were a problem. He said he would use the "White-House effect" to solve the problem. The "White-House effect" in this case is to do nothing until the polar caps melt and his house in Kennebunkport, Maine, washes away.

I don't want it to look like I always bag on Bush, but he's just so easy. Not as easy as Dan Quayle, but someone has to lead this freak show.

But this is the new and improved George

Kirk Caraway

COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

Bush for the 1990s. He's the down-home guy who actually brings his grandchildren to the White House and doesn't need Michael Deaver to mark out the places on the stage where he should stand. He bumbles, he stumbles, he misspeaks, but he somehow does it in such a human way. He's not an actor, he's the real thing.

But what about those lying lips? The people don't love him, but they do give him a 79 percent approval rating. That is the highest of any president this century. People approve of the job Bush is doing, but they just can't figure out why. They can't point to anything he has done, but gee, life is good and Bush seems to be having fun.

It's a far cry from the time when he was regularly featured as the invisible wimp on the comics page. You can see his lips now, for one thing. He's the man who got tough on Noriega — and soft on China. Oh well, nobody paid any attention to those secret missions Bush sent to China. He wasn't cowering, he was just keeping the diplomatic channels open, not to mention the economic channels. This is important to his brother Prescott Bush, who is trying to make a deal to build a resort and golf course in Shanghai.

He's the all-American boy, the war hero waving his fire-proof flag high above crowd. Never mind the fact he forgot the words of the pledge of allegiance during a campaign stop on his presidential campaign. That was his lips' fault.

While he's popular now, wait until the budget battle heats up. During his State of the Union address, Bush announced proposed cuts in troop numbers in Europe. This statement drew applause from most everyone except Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Colin Powell, who sat silent with a less-than-pleased look on his face. Just when he makes it to the top military post in the country, the president wants to cut back his toy budget.

But don't worry, Colin. According to recent reports, you have $30 billion in unnecessary surplus weapons and spare parts. In fact, you have so much junk that good, expensive stuff is rusting away in the rain because your warehouses are full of needless junk. And then, the Air Force has the stupidity to buy "heavy duty" fax machines at a price of $421,000 each. So stop playing with your toys and get your house in order.

Gen. Powell isn't the only one who will be feeling the cut of the budget knife. Bush's lips have stuck him with an impossible task: balance the budget, keep a "credible" military force, be the "education president," clean up the environment, win the drug war and don't raise taxes.

Ronald Reagan used some smoke and mirrors to get his budgets through, but Bush is going to have to pull off a magic act that would put Houdini to shame and hope no one is looking. He is already masking the true size of the deficit by robbing Social Security and keeping the Savings and Loan bailout "off budget." As has been stated by many commentators, if an accountant tried to run a company with these types of bookkeeping tricks, he would end up counting vegetables in a prison kitchen.

Yes, so remember, if you want to know if George Bush is lying, read his lips.

It's Just Another Preschool

A teacher guides a hand over the face of a doll to help the child learn parts of the body.

Carrie Werth, graduate student, welcomes a new student to the Early Childhood Developmental Center. Werth works 20 hours per week as a volunteer.

It's just like any other preschool.

Four children scamper in a playroom filled with stuffed animals, puzzles and brightly colored blocks. Children sit in a circle singing "Winnie the Pooh," "Five Little Ducks" and "Head, Shoulders, Knees and Toes." Later, the children make snakes out of blue Silly Putty.

But this isn't an ordinary preschool, and these games serve a far greater need than entertainment. The children who attend Big Lakes Developmental Center are developmentally delayed, and the activities teach them how to count, develop hand-to-eye coordination and interact in a social atmosphere.

Sue Frady, Big Lakes Developmental Center special projects supervisor, said more than 35 children, aged 2 through 5, attend Early Childhood Developmental Centers in Junction City, Wamego and Manhattan.

About 59 percent of the children in the Early Childhood Developmental Center were able to go on to a regular kindergarten or preschool in 1988, Frady said.

"It's basically just like a regular preschool program," said Carrie Werth, graduate student in early childhood handicapped. "But we have developmentally delayed kids."

Each child has the right to participate in the developmental learning experiences needed to develop, learn and grow, Frady said. Interaction with other children and specialists allows the child to benefit in the years when special education can be the most rewarding.

Werth said working at the center as a volunteer has given her an opportunity to get to know the children.

Three teachers and four students participate in a song that associates names with parts of the body.

"The experience is great," Werth said. "I get a lot of hands-on experience with the children and interaction with the other staff members."

Werth said she is entering her third week of volunteer work at the center and is anticipating forming bonds with the children.

"The kids are really open to people, even though I just started a couple weeks ago," she said. "They're already used to me and helpful in anything."

"They are always so loving, want to learn so much and are so interested in everything."

A key to interaction with the children is to teach through example, Werth said.

"We try to relate to them as friend to friend rather than as a teacher to a student," she said.

The children spend three hours a day at the center. Werth said during this time, they are involved in individual play and group activities.

"We have a high teacher-to-student ratio which allows us to spend a lot of time with each child," she said. "Each child receives an assessment test to determine what their developmental age is. We then go from the level they're at and try to get to the level they should be."

Werth said a 5-year-old may perform at the level of a 2-year-old in a given task, and goals are set to raise his or her performance to others of the same age.

Appropriate goals are set for the child and re-evaluated often, Werth said. Occupational therapy and speech pathology are available twice a week to the children who need it.

One of her own goals is to help take each child as far as possible toward full potential.

"I want to do all I can and reach the goals any way I can," Werth said. "I want the kids to have a good experience while they're here, so they have fun, enjoy it and want to come back the next day."

Werth said seeing a child's progression gives her a feeling of achievement, knowing that she is making a difference in an individual's life.

"There's not a big difference between these kids and all the others," Werth said. "They're all at different levels with different handicaps, but they're all still just kids."

Lady Cats look to regroup after loss

By David Svoboda
Sports Reporter

After a 15-point road loss to Missouri on Sunday, the Lady Cats will attempt to get back on the winning track when they face Nebraska at 7 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

The loss against the Tigers was K-State's first in Big Eight play, and narrowed the Lady Cat lead over Missouri and Oklahoma State in the conference to a single game. K-State is 7-1, while Missouri and Oklahoma State are 6-2.

Dealing with defeat for the first time in the league season worked to the Lady Cats' advantage in practice on Monday, interim coach Gaye Griffin said.

"We probably had the best practice we've had all year," she said. "It was easily the most physical. We worked on hitting the boards hard."

"In the first go around in the conference, we did a really good job, fundamentally, in blocking out, getting good position and being aware of what you have to do to get rebounds. Keeping the opposition off the boards and getting in synch offensively are our keys right now."

While K-State, 15-6 overall, is seeing some success as of late, Nebraska has struggled a bit.

The Cornhuskers are 2-6 in the Big Eight and 10-11 overall. Earlier this season, K-State downed Nebraska 67-60 in the Bob Devaney Sports Center in Lincoln. The win was the first for the Lady Cats in Devaney in six years.

The five-game losing streak in Lincoln was virtually the only blemish on an otherwise outstanding K-State mark against Nebraska. The Lady Cats lead the all-time series 24-8, and Nebraska has won only once in Manhattan in the past seven meetings.

Nebraska's lone win against K-

State on the Lady Cat home floor was during the 1987-88 season, when the Cornhuskers were on their way to a Big Eight regular season championship.

The Lady Cats will play four of their six remaining conference games in Bramlage, where they have won eight straight and have a two-year 19-3 record.

That bodes well for the team, but Griffin said K-State must open games better than it has been to continue its success. At Missouri Sunday, the team was down 41-27 at the half.

"We've been down by six or eight to open several games," Griffin said. "We're going to have to do a better job of coming out and getting started."

"That was my pregame speech the other day at Missouri. It goes back to the practice floor, and the way you work the first five to 10 minutes of practice."

Griffin is glad to be back home following a stretch in which the Lady Cats played four of five conference contests on the road.

"We've been averaging a lot more people than any other school in the conference at home," she said. "I love our student section, and our band is great. We need to continue with the kind of support we've been getting."

Forward Diana Miller and the rest of the Lady Cats will be looking to get back on the winning track at 7 p.m. in Bramlage Coliseum when they play host to Nebraska. K-State has a one-game lead in the Big Eight Conference standings with a 7-1 record. The Lady Cats are 15-6 overall.

ABC may sue Fighting Irish

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — ABC Sports said Tuesday it was considering legal action against Notre Dame, NBC and the College Football Association in its battle to keep Fighting Irish home games.

Stephen J. Solomon, senior vice president of ABC Sports, angrily accused NBC and Notre Dame of interfering with its $210 million, five-year deal with the CFA that begins in 1991.

He also said that the network would not pay the full amount of money due in the contract unless Notre Dame home games were included. Both NBC and Notre Dame defended their actions, with NBC stating Tuesday: "We acted fairly in this situation."

Meanwhile, ABC executives met Tuesday in New York with Chuck Neinas, the CFA's executive director. Dave O'Grian, the CFA's assistant executive director for television, said in a telephone interview from Boulder, Colo.: "While we are familiar with the steps they might take against Notre Dame and NBC Sports, I don't think there's been any indication that ABC will pursue anything like that (legal action) against us."

"Now that Notre Dame unilaterally pulled out of the package, we're trying to work it out so that there are 63 schools involved instead of 64," O'Grian said.

Notre Dame and NBC agreed Monday to a five-year contract for the Fighting Irish's home games, beginning in 1991. The CFA and ABC agreed on Jan. 17 to a five-year, $210 million contract.

"I believe that we have a contract with the CFA that includes all 64 schools, including Notre Dame," Solomon said. "Notre Dame is part of the deal we entered into with the CFA. We have informed them by letter that we have an agreement with the CFA that includes them."

Asked if ABC or its parent, Capital Cities Inc., would take legal action to preserve the deal, Solomon said: "That's certainly one of the options we're entertaining."

"We made it clear we had no commitment to the CFA," said Rev. E. William Beauchamp, Notre Dame's executive vice president, who is a lawyer. "Each school has to sign on."

Jets, Cardinals hire coaches

By The Associated Press

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. — The New York Jets, spurned by their first choice, named Cincinnati Bengals offensive coordinator Bruce Coslet to succeed Joe Walton as head coach.

The 43-year-old Coslet was chosen over Mike Holmgren of the 49ers, also an offensive coordinator, who told the Jets on Monday that he was staying in San Francisco.

Both were recommended by Bill Walsh, the former 49ers' coach, under whom Coslet broke in as an assistant after an eight-year career as a Bengals tight end.

The appointment comes exactly six weeks after Walton was fired by Dick Steinberg, who took over while the team was in the final throes of a 4-12 season.

And it comes exactly two weeks after Michigan State coach George Perles agreed on a $6 million, five-year contract with the Jets then backed out after getting the athletic director's job. Neither Coslet's salary nor the length of his contract was disclosed, but the starting salary for most first-year NFL coaches is usually between $300,000 and $400,000.

"When we started this search Dec. 26, I said I was looking for a coach who was a strong motivator, a teacher and a disciplinarian," Steinberg said. "I believe we've found the man who meets that description."

Coslet, who called his new job a dream come true, takes over a team that entered the 1989 season with high hopes, following an 8-7-1 year, and finished demoralized. There were more than 50,000 no-shows for the Jets' final home game.

By The Associated Press

PHOENIX — Joe Bugel, backed by 15 years of NFL experience, has the job of coaching the Phoenix Cardinals back to respectability.

"This is probably the greatest moment of my life," the former Washington Redskins assistant head coach said after general manager Larry Wilson announced the hiring of Bugel. "This was a job I truly truly wanted."

Bugel had said earlier he was looking forward to working with Wilson and Cardinals owner Bill Bidwill, adding that the Cardinals "have some impact players" and a great new training facility under construction, both factors he expects to help him revamp the team.

The 49-year-old Bugel, an offensive assistant under Joe Gibbs, becomes the Cardinals' sixth coach since 1979 and 30th in the team's 70-year NFL history. He was one of seven finalists for the job, which became vacant with the firing of Gene Stallings on Nov. 20.

Gibbs reacted to the news by saying, "We're going to miss him. He's a good friend and a great coach. You have mixed feelings when something like this happens."

"He's come through the coaching ranks, I think, the right way, so we're glad to see him get this opportunity. The worst thing about this is that we'll have to face Joe twice a year."

Bugel, a nine-year assistant with the Redskins, began his coaching career as an offensive line coach for the Detroit Lions in 1975-76 and coached the Houston Oilers offensive line from 1977-80.

Mizzou's Coleman summoned for assault

By The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Jamal Coleman, a sophomore forward on Missouri's top-ranked basketball team, has received a summons to appear in Municipal Court on suspicion of third-degree assault after an incident last week.

Coleman, 20, was accused of striking a 22-year-old man during a traffic dispute that began in a supermarket parking lot last Friday, Columbia Police Capt. Dennis Veach said.

Coleman was arrested Saturday and was issued the municipal summons. But Veach said that the victim no longer wishes to have Coleman prosecuted for the alleged misdemeanor.

Veach said Coleman gave police a conflicting account of the incident, but he declined to elaborate.

The office of city prosecutor said it did not have anything on the alleged assault, and the municipal court clerk, Leslie Barbee, said she had no record of an assault charge being filed against the basketball player.

According to police, Coleman apparently riled the 22-year-old man about 8:30 p.m. Friday by driving a car the wrong direction in the parking lot.

The man yelled at the him, and the two men drove out onto a street, later stopping their cars and getting out. Veach said Coleman struck the man twice in the face, splitting his lip.

The man, who according to police did not strike back, flagged down a police car and gave officers Coleman's license plate number. One of the passengers in the man's car told police he thought he recognized Coleman as the assailant.

The man was released from a local hospital.

Professional athletes' egos becoming inflated by dollar signs

Chris
Hays

IT'S JUST MADNESS

In the days of the ego-inflated heads of professional sports athletes, and the high-flying salaries that contribute directly to those egos, the players and owners in the professional sports market have created a seemingly uncontrollable monster.

It's a monster that has given a player some kind of satisfaction to make one more dollar than an athlete of equal talent.

Take Bo Jackson, for instance. Bo may know baseball, football, or anything else that requires a jock strap, but just because Texas outfielder Ruben Sierra has a contract that will pay him $1,900,000, doesn't mean that Bo will be proving a point if he is awarded $1,900,001.

The egos are starting to run rampant in professional sports, and it's about time the owners came to grips with the reality that things are starting to get out of control.

The free-agency zoo, which can be blamed on ex-St. Louis Cardinal outfielder Curt Flood, has nearly made the game itself a mere side attraction to the money-waving owners, who will throw themselves, and their money, at the feet of any player with decent numbers.

Since free agency became such a big deal when the Yankees' George Steinbrenner gave Catfish Hunter the first million-dollar contract, the free-agent frenzy has bolted to astronomical proportions.

And the 1989 Winter Baseball Meetings were made into a joke. Agents took over, and the owners sat back and listened.

The meetings, in the past, were used to make the now-defunct big trade, but in this day and age, trades have become, more-or-less, the deal to be made later. The legal terms like free agents, arbitrations and contract renegotiations have taken over.

Owners are now more concerned with luring the big-name player with the big-time bucks, than making that one big trade. There has become a new, modern-day baseball.

Modern-day baseball used to be considered the time that statistics were first tallied in the early 1900s. But the statistics have come a long way from the time when they were merely for the fancy of the fan.

Now, big stats mean big bucks. It's easy to see the change in baseball over the past 10 years. In 1978, the penny-pinching owner of the Minnesota Twins Calvin Griffith could have started a precedent around the league. He refused to offer then-hitting star Rod Carew enough money to keep the perennial all-star in Minneapolis.

But it was guys like Gene Autry and Steinbrenner who couldn't keep a cap on their players' salaries, trying to buy championships instead of earning them the way guys like Casey Stengel once did.

Griffith couldn't handle the never-ending salary feuds with his players, so he sold the Twins to Carl Pohled, who had no problem throwing away a few greenbacks.

Pohled started the most recent madness. When Twins' centerfielder Kirby Puckett threatened to leave the "Homer Dome," Pohled promptly renegotiated Puckett's contract to make him the highest-paid player in baseball — for a day.

Next there was Bret Saberhagen, Mark Langston, Mark Davis, Robin Yount, and so on.

What may have been the biggest surprise-entry into the free agent wars was Kansas City owner Ewing Kauffman. Kauffman, the once-stubborn owner who had, basically, built a world-championship team from his own farm club system, finally bowed to the pressures of big-money baseball.

Kauffman, who once had let people like Pete Rose, Rick Sutcliffe, Jack Morris, Kirk Gibson and others slide through the Royals' grasp because he wouldn't put up the cash, jumped the bandwagon this year signing free agents Richard Dotson, Mark Davis and Storm Davis, and then re-signed Saberhagen.

And then Steinbrenner, the guy who started all of the bidding wars in the first place, had the gall to be upset with Kauffman. (The Marion Laboratories millionaire was forced into his recent splurge by the likes of you, George.)

It was a surprise that Kauffman lowered himself to the level of the demanding, egotistical players, who not only want a million bucks, but also a better pension plan.

I think they need someone to manage all of their money if they're worried about pensions.

A million bucks a year, retirement by at least 40, and they want a pension plan, too. I think I need a pinch in the ribs, to see if I'm not just dreaming this whole thing.

Nobody is worth a million bucks a year to play a kid's game, but if a million bucks was going to be the limit, then so be it.

The problem is, no one is satisfied with a $1 million anymore. Heck, that's what a utility infielder makes, not a star like the San Francisco Giants' Will Clark. Clark says he wasn't in it for the money, but I'm sure he's rather happy to be the $4 million dollar man, and the latest in the highest-paid player category.

Vegas should start running bets on who will be the next highest-paid player. I'm sure, however, there wouldn't be very good odds.

The fact players are making these outrageous salaries isn't enough to satisfy everyone.

Now, the owners want in on the act, and if the Major League Baseball Players' Association doesn't come to terms with the owners' revenue-sharing proposal, then, come Feb. 15, the first day for spring training, there will be a lockout, and all spring training facilities will be closed until an agreement is reached.

The baseball players-owners struggle has become worse than the struggles between Goodyear and the United Rubberworkers Union. Only the $20-an-hour rubberworker has a little bit more to gripe about.

Come on guys, let's just play ball.

Musical influences gala

Benefit supper sponsored by support group

By Lori Stauffer
Collegian Reporter

Denim and fishing attire will be the required dress for the Post-Performance Gala hosted by the Friends of McCain following the Feb. 11 performance of "Big River, The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn."

Karen Rogers, fund-raising chairman for Friends of McCain, said the atmosphere of the musical will be reflected in the Post-Performance Gala. Proceeds will benefit Friends of McCain.

Friends of McCain was formed to promote and support the arts at K-State. Its primary goal is to raise programming funds for McCain Auditorium. Rogers said with the diminishing amount of grants, productions are dependent on ticket sales to finance their projects. Because of this, Friends has become a very important source of revenue for the productions.

"Our purpose is to make friends and make dollars," Rogers said.

The supper will be seafood and picnic food, said Brent Bowman, the gala chairman. The request of denim and fishing attire as the gala's dress code is opposed to the traditional formal wear for dinners.

"It will be relatively informal, all along the Huck Finn vein," Bowman said.

"This is why we chose a supper rather than a dinner. We wanted it to be more casual," Rogers said.

Rogers said the committee came up with the idea for the gala by researching the play and the songs. With the original story by Mark Twain, she said they wanted to remind people of the great things Twain said.

Rogers cited an incident when Twain had been reported to have died.

"He said, 'The reports of my death are greatly exaggerated,'" Rogers said. "It is things like this that we want to remind people of. It makes it fun. And we want to educate people about the times as well."

Written by Roger Miller, "Big River" is a musical version of Mark Twain's Adventures of Huckleberry Finn.

This gala is not the first hosted by the Friends of McCain. A Chocoholic Frolic preceding "Sweet Charity" in the fall of 1988 and a Light Up the Night dinner held before the performance of "Mame" last semester has brought in funds for the organization, Bowman said.

Three generations of local family share in history of Girl Scouts

By Margaret Clarkin
Collegian Reporter

Shortbread, chocolate mint and peanut butter cookies were the only choices 30 years ago when Verletta Myers, Manhattan, sold Girl Scout cookies.

Now her daughter, Tina, sells seven different kinds of cookies. Carmel Delights, Lemon Pastry Creams, Golden Yangles and Peanut Butter Patties have been added to the list.

One of the main fund raisers for Girl Scouts is the annual cookie sale, which ended in the last part of January.

"My daughter was so excited (about the cookie sale). She thought she had to go out every day," Myers said.

Myers has been involved with Girl Scouts since she was a member. Thirty years ago, her mother, Beta Clagett, Manhattan, started Brownie Troop 372. Now, Tina is in that troop.

Tina has been in Girl Scouts for three years and said she is excited about it.

"I think it's real fun. These are good years to be in Girl Scouts," Tina said.

It's fun to teach the girls how to do things, and it is a meaningful experience, Myers said.

"We have a lot of fun," Myers said. "My mom's 61, and she's never grown up. But she's got experience under her belt. And I'm just a kid at heart."

The girls think selling cookies each year is fun, Clagett said. They like to go door to door and meet new people.

"We don't challenge Brownies as much as Juniors (the next level up) to sell in quantities. We teach Brownies how to sell and learn if someone doesn't want cookies, that's fine," Clagett said.

Girl Scouts is based on everyday principles like getting along with people and using the buddy system when selling cookies, Clagett said.

"Girls should never go by themselves or go inside a house. They should go with their mother or sister. We never used to have to worry

principal-counselor-student

The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of these high schools to attend the 1990 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with you about your preparation for and experiences in KSU academic programs. Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school faculty. You are welcome to drop by between 10:15 a.m. and 12:15 on Wednesday Feb. 21. This is an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

Novel develops family history

Laura Scroggins

REVIEW

Anyone who is sensitive to turmoil in the family will find Danielle Steele's latest novel a poignant, moving story. It is a story to empathize, appreciate, sympathize with and love.

Steele has successfully pulled herself from the depths of her previous book "Star," to reach a pinnacle in character development by bringing us a family story of understanding, sacrifice and survival with "Daddy."

In her latest best-seller, Steele takes readers through a 20-year chronological examination of the Watson family, evoking feelings of great joy and devastating pain.

The author raises questions about society and the roles of parenting. A seemingly normal upstate New York family suddenly loses its mother to Harvard graduate school.

During the events that follow, the Watson family is devastated.

The mother, Sarah Watson, leaves behind her well-ordered and expensive lifestyle after being admitted to graduate school. She leaves immediately for Harvard, silently knowing she will never return.

Although it takes time, Oliver Watson eventually picks up the pieces of his broken home and encourages his three children to do the same. Readers are taken through this traumatic experience while being introduced to the rest of the family.

Benjamin is the oldest child, and the first to be affected by the breakup of his parents. He takes his anger and frustration and turns to his friends and his girlfriend Sandra. While Benjamin's grades are declining and his dreams of the Ivy League are crashing down around him, Sandra becomes pregnant, further complicating their lives.

Melanie, the middle child and the only girl, blames her father vehemently and withdraws from the family for a time, always reminding her father of her extreme displeasure with their situation. She is also the first to disapprove of the woman her father brings home.

The youngest child, nine-year-old Sam, is devastated that his mother thinks she needs more in her life than him. He reverts to the habits of a younger child, becoming insecure and often whining. Nightmares and bed-wetting keep him and his father awake countless nights.

Oliver's mother is suddenly stricken with Alzheimer's disease and deteriorates rapidly. His father painfully watches as she slips away, turning to Oliver for comfort. The two men commiserate and attempt to ease the trauma involved with losing the

'Das Boot' displays realism

German film illustrates life at sea in submarine journey

Mark Schreiner

REVIEW

Billed as the most expensive German film ever made, "Das Boot" uses the submarine that Indiana Jones tailgated a ride on, in "Raiders of the Lost Ark," to tell a different story—that of the men inside the submarine.

West German director Wolfgang Petersen's claustrophobic tale is set in a German U-boat prowling for British ships in 1941.

We first see the U-boat in its factory, born of steel and sparks with men crawling over it like butlers polishing a giant teapot. Once at sea, however, it becomes a maze like the inside of a computer, with the crew doomed forever to tinker uselessly with its valves.

The plot focuses on the 43-man crew who are at sea alone together for more than three months in a 10-by-150-foot steel balloon. It begins with a rowdy, patriotic party and ends with their final destiny in a U-boat harbor in France.

Along the way, they sustain hits from depth charges dropped by British destroyers, run the gauntlet at the Strait of Gibraltar and catch a whopping case of cabin fever.

The film's biggest character, the captain, played by Jurgen Prochnow, hardly says anything. He knows that only 25 percent of the Germans serving on World War II German U-boats survive. His realistic grimace exemplifies the film's realism.

U-boat sailors, knowing their escape and survival gear are only for show, wouldn't waste energy having personalities, and "Das Boot" reproduces this.

"Das Boot" also reproduces the one bathroom that serves the whole crew, the hanging food, the low ceiling, the beards, the greasy hair and the stench of bunks used 24 hours a day in rotation by the crew, none of whom have a change of clothing or a place to shower.

It reproduces the case of crabs that ran through the crew, the fear at the sound of annoying sonar dings from the British ships and the sinking feeling of diving deeper than the U-boat is designed for.

At great depths, the bolts holding the hull together pop out like corks from a bottle of champagne, triggering lasers of water which slice through any flesh in its path. The red haze in "Das Boot" is not from rose-colored glasses as in many Hollywood war movies, but from blood mixed with salt water and red-alert lights.

Film looks at race relations

'Do the Right Thing' gives view at causes of violence

Mark Schreiner

REVIEW

Spike Lee's "Do The Right Thing" takes snapshots of a day in the life of a run-down neighborhood in Brooklyn to present a modern and realistic view of racial problems.

"Do The Right Thing" was written, produced and directed by Lee. The Union Program Council Feature Film shows at 7 and 9:30 p.m. Friday and Saturday and at 7 p.m. Sunday in Forum Hall.

The film centers on Mookie, a young black man who delivers pizzas on foot. His boss is Sal, a white man who runs a pizzeria with his sons, Vito and Pino.

Vito wants to move the business from the predominantly black block, but Sal likes the majority of his customers and is proud that they grew up on his pizza.

When Mookie points out that Pino's heroes — Magic Johnson, Eddie Murphy and Prince — are black, Pino contends that they "aren't really black."

Trouble brews when a young black eating in Sal's restaurant complains that only pictures of white people hang on the wall. Sal retorts, "This is my pizzeria, and I say Italian-Americans on the wall only."

Mookie is Sal's buffer, and Sal expects him to deliver pizzas to the outside world and to calm irate black customers.

Mookie dislikes this role. He simply wants to work to support his sister and his son, whose mother is Mookie's Hispanic girlfriend. He steals visits with them between deliveries. He also takes showers and talks with his friends on company time, creating friction with Sal.

Mookie's friends are the supporting cast. They include the Mayor, a drunk who buys one can of beer at a time and drinks it from a brown bag. The Mayor mysteriously tells Mookie, "Always do the right thing."

A woman called Mother-sister sits in a window and nags everyone. "Mookie," she says, "Do something with yourself."

The film is full of such unsavory morals. Once Mookie's girlfriend's mother tells him, "Take care of your responsibilities," meaning his son. Mookie's sister inexplicably tells Mother-sister, "I'm down for something positive in the community."

But the story's main focus is Mookie's conflicting responsibilities. He must chase his friends from Sal's, but he wants to talk to them. He must make money, but he wants to rest. He must care for his child, but he has little money.

The story progresses episodically, focusing on disjointed vignettes. As the heat of the day grows, so do the block's problems. In the end, Lee's film blames racial problems on no one but the police.

The film's symbols are obvious and dichotomous. Mookie, for example, wears the Brooklyn Dodgers jersey of Jackie Robinson, the black who broke the Major Leagues' color barrier. In one scene, a white landlord, wearing Larry Bird's jersey, runs his bicycle over a black's Air Jordans. Vito claims Roger Clemens is a better pitcher than Mookie's favorite, Dwight Gooden.

The movie's grand symbol, however, is a black-and-white photo of Malcolm X and the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. that a stuttering man named Smiley sells in the neighborhood. Quotes from the leaders, one advocating non-violence and the other violence in self-defense, end the film.

This juxtaposition illustrates Mookie's Catch-22. Just as violence is the only alternative but violence is self-defeating, Mookie must work for Sal even though it contradicts his conscience. The movie's climax emphasizes this dilemma even more.

Director Lee is represented by the stuttering Smiley, trying to get his message of a mix of King and X to the world but unable to communicate it.

The film is not all racial tension. Lee includes a scene where a black named Radio, equipped with 20 "D" batteries in his portable stereo, defeats a Hispanic and his stereo in a decibel joust. At another point, Lee shows blacks, whites, Hispanics, and Koreans playing the dozens, trying to outdo each other trading insults. Smiley struggles to cuss through his stutter.

Lee seems to say that conflict is unavoidable. Radio likes loud music, but it irritates Sal. Three black men sitting on a corner are jealous of a Korean couple who opened their own business after only one year in the United States.

But such reconciliation of seeming opposites doesn't always happen. I saw "Do The Right Thing" at Haymaker Hall on Jan. 18. It was shown as part of Martin Luther King Recognition Week, said Dave Haden, Haymaker hall director.

Haymaker has two TV rooms, and both TVs are connected to one VCR. When I arrived, whites and blacks were watching the sitcom "A Different World" in one room. When "Do The Right Thing" was played, the groups separated to their own rooms.

Matthew Mazuroski, as John Halder, hugs Donna Molnar playing Anne in "Good." The play opens at 8 p.m. in Nichols Theatre.

Play examines era of Nazi evil

By Erica Yenni
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Players production of "GOOD" runs Feb. 8-10 and Feb. 15-17. The play deals with the world of Nazi Germany during World War II.

"GOOD" asks the question: "How does a good man rationalize his way to a high office in Auschwitz?" The main character, John Halder, is a German writer who is drawn into the SS hierarchy yet manages to justify his actions to himself. Halder is played by Matthew Mazur, senior in theater.

Another key character in the production is Maurice, a Jewish friend who Halder has an opportunity to help to freedom, but instead leaves to his own fate. Geoffrey Kaufman, graduate student in theater, plays Maurice.

Other characters in the play include Adolf Hitler and Halder's sister, mother, wife and mistress.

Kate Anderson, associate professor in speech, is director of the play. She said the play is not just about Nazi Germany, but also how people dealt with life during that time period.

"This is about people and societies faced with difficult choices and how they deal with those choices," Anderson said.

Although "GOOD," which discusses a painful time in history, might be considered a dark moral parable, the tone of the play is pointedly light and comic.

Anderson said a live band on-stage plays music which underscores the protagonist's dreams and nightmares.

Provost James Coffman said Pohlman will devote as much of his time as possible to Essential Edge before leaving.

"He will have the momentum rolling for the person who will replace him," Coffman said.

Pohlman said he has two regrets about leaving the University at this time. One is being unable to stay for the duration of Essential Edge, and the other are plans for major renovations of Calvin Hall scheduled for 1994.

"I'm really going to miss the students, staff, faculty and fellow deans here," Pohlman said. "I'm not sure anyone realizes what a wonderful job President (Jon) Wefald, Provost Coffman, Vice President (Bob) Krause and others have done at K-State. From an insider's point of view it has been nothing short of incredible."

Coffman said an interim dean would be appointed at the time of Pohlman's departure.

"We get degraded by some of the guys who try to intimidate us," Nikki said. "That's one bad thing we have to put up with are guys who are animals, who treat us like pieces of meat."

She recalled one instance when a man yelled profanely for her to remove all of her costume until she began to cry.

The story gently prods us to admit, even in our selfish society, that family values aren't a setback to having a successful life, and that being responsible to and for others is nothing to be taken lightly.

In the end, the family emerges changed, but strengthened by the hardship.

The reporter gives the film's moral most plainly. "I wanted to come (on a U-boat) to be face to face with destiny in a manly world where reality rules cruel and magnificent," he said. "Well, this (death) is reality, isn't it?"

While a cliffhanger, "Das Boot" doesn't approach the constant adrenaline of, for example, "Die Hard" or "The Abyss." Its length — clocking in at 144 minutes — contributes to this. So does its realistic lack of character development.

"Das Boot," which means "The Boat" in German, is in German with English subtitles. The Union Program Council Kaleidoscope Films presentation will be shown at 7 p.m. Wednesday in Forum Hall, at 3:30 p.m. Thursday in the Little Theatre and at 7 p.m. Thursday in Forum Hall.

of the pledge member's death. "I was a prime hazer of pledges," he said. "I believed in hazing."

A former prosecuting attorney, Westol has been speaking to groups about hazing for 9 years. He said he often thinks about quitting.

"I don't like talking about what I did to pledges," Westol said.

Sororities aren't exempt from hazing charges. One national sorority was placed on probation for marking an "X" on body parts of pledge members that actives thought should lose weight, he said. "The mental abuse hurts more than the physical abuse."

Members of fraternities and sororities said they thought the seminar was relevant.

"It was very motivational. I believe that all hazing is bad and mental hazing is the worst," said Scott Doherty, a member of Theta Chi from KU.

The seminar was sponsored by Greek Affairs and Alpha Delta Pi sorority. In January 1989, ADPi was placed on social suspension through Fall 1989 for hazing violations. Barb Robel, adviser for Greek Affairs, said the sorority's sponsorship of the seminar was not linked to the incident.

The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn comes to the stage in a Tony Award-winning Broadway musical that's as big as all outdoors. Roger Miller's lyrics capture the essence of Mark Twain's colorful characters and his tuneful score blends bluegrass and gospel with just the right touch of Nashville. Splendid sets provide a memorable backdrop for the crooks and con men, kindly kinfolk and starchy spinsters Huck encounters on his journey to becoming one of the greatest creations in American fiction.

Communists agree to competition

Decision ends days of speculation, single-party system born in 1917

From Staff and Wire Reports

MOSCOW — The Communist Party, that for decades swore its red tide would cover the globe, bowed to a different revolution Wednesday. The party agreed to allow alternative political parties to compete for control of the Soviet Union.

The decision amounts to an acknowledgment that new political forces have taken root and that it is no longer possible or desirable to crush them with the repressive tactics of the past, which ranged from mass murders under dictator Josef Stalin to the dissident arrests preferred by Leonid I. Brezhnev.

The decision by the party's Central Committee to give up the Communists' constitutional monopoly on power was a triumph of political maneuvering by President Mikhail S. Gorbachev. He packed the meeting of the 249-member body with more than 700 other officials, many of them progressives who took the floor to demand radical reform.

In the end, the guests also were allowed to vote on the new party platform, said Svyatoslav Fyodorov, a famed eye surgeon and one of the participants. He spoke in an interview on Red Square during a break in the closed-door meeting.

"Article 6 will no longer be, there will be a multiparty system. There will be a normal democracy," Fyodorov said.

John Daly, an assistant professor of history, said Article 6 of the Soviet Constitution guarantees the Communists one-party leadership of the government.

"Since late 1917 this will be the first time another party will be allowed to run and participate in the government," Daly said. "It will be harder for us now to sustain the image of the evil empire, (but) it's not going to make any difference in terms of our foreign policy."

"I think (the proposal) will attempt to take the guy on the assembly line — the guy who works hard — from being pissed off and powerless to happier and involved."

"We cannot rule out the emergence of new parties," Politburo member Vitaly I. Vorotnikov said in remarks reported by Tass, the official news agency. "But we Communists are not going to surrender our positions. Just as any party in the world, we shall be waging a struggle for our rights."

Vorotnikov added that the party will negotiate with any political force that stands for democracy and rejects violence. "We shall speak not only with Communists but with the whole people," he was quoted as telling visiting parliamentarians from Brazil.

Fyodorov said that only maverick Communist Boris N. Yeltsin voted against the platform that called for abolition of Article 6, which calls the party the "leading and guiding" force in Soviet society.

Yeltsin favored a more radical program that demanded a virtual apology by the party for decades of totalitarianism.

After leaving the Central Committee meeting to greet U.S. Secretary of State James A. Baker III, Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze told reporters the decision by the party's policy-making body "moves us closer to a humane and democratic society."

The Soviets follow the lead set by their comrades in Eastern Europe, where one by one, Communist parties have bowed to democratic pressure and relinquished their legal guarantee of political control.

Ariadna Martin, instructor of modern languages, said the changes are good, but predicted that many party members will resist it.

She said the constitutional changes will improve the lives of the Soviet citizens if they

Rental committee to discuss revisions

By Steve Franzen
Staff Reporter

A citizens' committee will discuss the future of rental housing in Manhattan and at K-State today.

At a 3 p.m. meeting in the City Commission Room at City Hall, the committee will discuss revisions to the second draft of a rental inspection program ordinance outline for Manhattan. The meeting is open to the public.

"The idea is to have some organized set of rules to ensure safe, properly priced housing," said Thomas Frith, a committee member and former director of the K-State Department of Housing.

Frith retired from his University position Monday.

The citizens' committee consists of 11 members appointed by the mayor and City Council. It advises the council on the rental inspection program.

Committee members hope to reach a consensus and set a date to present the draft to the City Council at today's meeting.

"We will go through the new additions to the draft, and any new South Africa is a country suffering great social problems caused by a policy of extreme racial segregation, known as apartheid, institutionalized by the government.

Yet last week, the country's president, F.W. de Klerk, took an enormous step toward resolving some of those problems when he withdrew the ban from the African National Congress and promised the release of its most prominent leader, Nelson Mandela, said Clive Fullagar, professor of psychology and former resident of South Africa.

The African National Congress, which has been banned by the government for the past 30 years, fought for the rights of the black majority of South Africa. De Klerk also withdrew the ban on the Communist Party and released several political prisoners.

"I was happy to hear de Klerk's announcement last week," said Jonathan Ramathoka, graduate student in agricultural education and a South African citizen. "This will give blacks a chance to negotiate with the white government on an equal basis." Fullagar said that in the past, the South African government negotiated only with black leaders who were chosen by the government, but this new development will allow blacks to choose their own representation.

Ramathoka said many people who had been living in exile will be able to return to South Africa now.

"Many of these people are highly creative and will be able to contribute actively to the welfare of the country if they return," he said.

The population of South Africa consists of four national or racial groups, 28 million blacks, 5 million whites, 3 million "coloreds" — who are citizens of interracial descent — and 1 million Indians, Ramathoka said. While each of the three minority groups has some form of representation in the government, the black majority has none, he said.

"One of the items that needs to be negotiated is how the voting system is going to be restructured to give blacks representation in the government," Ramathoka said.

As a teacher, another issue Ramathoka said he is concerned about is the educational system in South Africa.

"The black population has been divided into seven different parts, each

Oil spill threatens beach

By The Associated Press

HUNTINGTON BEACH, Calif. — A tanker apparently collided with an underwater pipeline within two miles of a Southern California beach Wednesday, spilling thousands of gallons of oil, officials said.

Initial reports indicated that up to 250,000 gallons of Alaskan crude oil spilled following the accident involving the 800-foot ship identified as the American Trader, said Coast Guard radioman Rod Koeppe.

It was not immediately clear if the oil had spilled from the ship or the pipeline, said Coast Guard Petty Officer Robert Beals.

The accident was reported around 4:30 p.m., Beals said.

The area is just off Huntington Beach, a city about 30 miles south of Los Angeles which has long been popular with Southern California surfers and sunbathers and has been the scene for movies and television shows featuring surfing.

The oil was reportedly drifting toward the area's popular Huntington Beach Pier.

Navigation charts show several submerged pipelines in the area, including a pipeline used by tankers to unload fuel oil for a Southern California Edison power plant at Huntington Beach, Beals said.

Cleanup crews from the Coast Guard, the Orange County Harbor Patrol and the county fire department went to the scene, officials said.

The ship was 1 1/2 miles south of Huntington Beach and coming into a tanker bunker which serves as an off-loading point for an oil terminal 30 miles north of Huntington Beach, said city lifeguard Capt. William Richardson.

Board discusses site options, budget, bond election date for middle school

By The Collegian Staff

The U.S.D. 383 Board of Education decided several important factors in building the new middle school.

After much deliberation, the board decided not to spend more on the school than the current bond issue will allow, which is $15.3 million. A provision in the law would allow the board to ask for up to four percent more money. But to do this the board has to ask the state for permission and hold an election, which it doesn't have time for.

The $15.3 million will go towards the cost of the land and building and furnishing the new middle school. Also, to remodel and expand the current facilities at the existing middle school.

Board members also decided to air condition part of Manhattan high school, and to expand the kitchen at the Amanda Arnold school. The rest is for architect and contingency fees.

The board set a date for the bond election, which will be May 8, 1990. The date for the election has to be at least 60 days before another election, and statewide primaries will be held in August.

Board members voted to further discuss an offer from the KSU Foundation for a piece of land at Seth Childs Road and Marlatt Avenue. The Foundation gave the board two options.

The district could buy the proposed 80 acres, but the price would have to be more than the $3,500 an acre. Or the board could buy 40 acres at that price, on the condition that it puts in sewer lines large enough to accommodate a residential area.

Sisters give artifacts

Kansas Indians' history depicted through collection

By Samantha Farr
Collegian Reporter

A collection of pre-Columbian artifacts has been donated to the K-State Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work.

Patricia O'Brien, professor of anthropology and curator of the 10,150-item collection, said the principal piece in the Ralph Bell collection is an oval pot once sought by the Smithsonian Institution.

The piece is one of two known intact oval clay pots with a pie crust lip made by Plains Indians about 1300 A.D. The second pot remains at the Historical Society in Topeka.

Bell, a former Salina master electrician and amateur archaeologist, spent more than 60 of his 78 years exploring ancient Indian campgrounds throughout central Kansas.

Bell died in 1988, leaving the collection to his daughters, Judy Ewalt and Cathy Farr of Salina. Ewalt and Farr made the donation to K-State.

O'Brien said the vast majority of the collection was found in McPherson and Rice counties. She said most of the artifacts are representative of the Wichita Indians. However, the earliest artifacts date to the Paleo Indians, who were the earliest known humans in Kansas dating from 6,000 to 8,000 B.C., she said.

"I'd say easily that 98 percent of it is proto-historic," O'Brien said. "That means somewhere probably between 1300 and 1500 A.D."

"Eventually, some exhibits will be held to show the material off," she said. "The collection is scientifically irreplaceable."

Besides 20 clay pots, ranging in size from eight to 20 inches deep, the collection contains pieces from many unassembled pots, as well as bone and stone tools, ax and arrow heads, beads and jewelry.

O'Brien said Bell's find of small metal links causes some people, such as Smithsonian Institution curator Waldo Wedel, to believe they were found on a site that was probably visited by the early Spanish explorer Coronado.

"It would be wonderful to say these came from Coronado or his men, but the links also could be from later Spanish explorers who traveled through Kansas," she said.

Cynthia Blaker, junior in anthropology, will be cataloging the collection. O'Brien said the American Ethnic Studies program granted $5,000 to K-State, which will allow Blaker to catalog the pieces.

"There are two reasons why we are doing inventory on the collection," O'Brien said. "It is partly so we can get it assessed. Also, so we can know exactly what we have."

During the last 10 years of his life, Bell resided in Elk, Wash., and returned summers to continue hunting, an activity he pursued until the mid-1980s.

Ewalt and Farr, whose daughter Liana Farr has been a student at K-State, wanted their father's collection to remain whole and in Kansas.

"We could easily have sold individual pieces from the collection," Ewalt, a 1972 K-State graduate, said. "But leaving the collection together tells a complete story about Kansas Indians. And through our connections to the University, the donation will make K-State's anthropology program stronger."

Baker tries to measure power

MOSCOW (AP) — Secretary of State James A. Baker III set out Wednesday night to measure the power of Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev to deal with the United States on world issues as the Communist Party undergoes major shifts.

Baker moved swiftly into an opening session with Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze, his plans unchanged, a few hours after the Communist Central Committee agreed to abolish the party's guarantee of political power.

Baker said on his flight here from Czechoslovakia he had not determined what impact the move, taken at Gorbachev's behest, would have on the Soviet leader's authority.

"Why don't you ask me that question after I spend two days with Mr. Gorbachev and Mr. Shevardnadze, and then I would be doing a lot more than just guessing for you. I would be giving you a very, very informed answer," Baker said.

Bill's aim to reverse rulings

WASHINGTON (AP) — Lawmakers of both parties joined by the head of the Episcopal Church and Coretta Scott King on Wednesday unveiled civil rights legislation designed to reverse recent Supreme Court rulings and help minorities and women fight job bias.

"Recent decisions of the court have reopened old wounds suffered in battles fought long ago," King told a news conference at which supporters called the measure the major civil rights bill now before Congress.

The bill launches a counterattack by congressional liberals and civil rights activists against a series of Supreme Court rulings last year. A newly solidified conservative court majority limited affirmative action and narrowed the scope of anti-bias laws.

Hearings in both the House and the Senate are set to begin within days. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said approval at the committee level might be possible within three months.

The Bush administration has been saying there is no urgent need for the legislation. Attorney General Dick Thornburgh has said forecasts of dire problems involving job bias represent an overreaction to the court's rulings.

Kennedy said that last year the Supreme Court "issued a series of rulings that mark an abrupt and unfortunate departure from its historic vigilance in protecting civil rights."

"The fabric of justice has been torn," Kennedy said.

Man sentenced for murder

KANSAS CITY, Kan. (AP) — A man convicted of murdering a 4-year-old boy during a cocaine deal with the child's father has been ordered to serve eight to 20 years in prison.

Gerald Jones, 20, pleaded guilty to a reduced charge of second-degree murder in the Sept. 10 shooting of Antonio Phillips. He was sentenced Monday in Wyandotte County District Court.

A second man, Darren Bryant, 21, was also charged with first-degree murder but pleaded guilty to possessing cocaine with intent to sell. He awaits sentencing.

The child's father, Solomon Phillips, 31, and a woman who was with him, Rhonda Williams, 32, await sentencing after pleading guilty to conspiracy to possess cocaine. They said they were trying to trade a $42 pair of tennis shoes for crack when a dispute arose.

Council signs violation decree

TOPEKA (AP) — The Frontenac City Council acknowledged in a consent decree signed Wednesday that it violated the state's Open Meetings Act during a December meeting.

Attorney General Robert Stephan announced the signing of the decree with his office and its filing in Crawford County District Court. The decree stipulates that the council comply with the act in the future and give each current and new council member a copy of the law.

Council members acknowledged that during an executive session called during their Dec. 18 meeting, they discussed pay increases for city employees and the city's contribution to its health insurance plan. Neither subject can be discussed in an executive session.

The council went into executive session under an exemption in the Open Meetings Act that allows closed sessions to discuss personnel matters.

Woman sues for love affair

EMPORIA (AP) — An Emporia woman, who says a therapist she saw for marriage counseling later began an affair with her husband and then left town with him, has filed suit against the Mental Health Center of East Central Kansas.

The suit was filed Tuesday in Lyon County District Court by Charlotte Norman, formerly Charlotte Oliver. She is seeking unspecified damages in excess of $10,000 from the center and Teresa Reed, the therapist who is also named in the suit.

The suit says that Reed later married Norman's former husband, Stephen Oliver, and that they live in Kansas City, Mo.

According to the suit, a local doctor referred Norman to the mental health center in November 1987 for treatment of depression resulting from "family and marital problems."

It says she was assigned to Reed for treatment and psychotherapy which lasted until August 1988. At that time, the suit says, Reed terminated the therapy with the plaintiff and began therapy with Oliver.

The suit says the therapist had recommended that Norman become more independent of her husband, and that the marital relationship worsened. It says Reed later suggested Oliver be brought to the therapy sessions and that the therapist said he was "very sick and needed help."

The suit alleges the mental health center and Reed breached their duties "to act with good faith, trust and in strict confidence" with Norman.

Eisenhower scholar to speak

Students, faculty and the public are invited to hear the presentation of a paper by Dr. Ian Bickerton, a senior lecturer in history at the University of New South Wales in Sydney, Australia, and a graduate of K-State.

The paper is titled "Dwight Eisenhower's Middle East Policy, With Special Reference to Israel" and will be presented at a meeting jointly sponsored by the Department of History and the Phi Alpha Theta History Honor Society at 2:30 p.m. today in K-State Union 208.

Bickerton earned his master's degree in history from K-State in 1965. He earned his bachelor's degree from the University of Adelaide in Australia and his doctoral degree in history from the Claremont Graduate School in California.

A specialist in American diplomatic history, Bickerton has had articles published about foreign policy during the Truman, Kennedy and Eisenhower administrations. His latest book is "The Arab-Israeli Conflict." Last fall Bickerton was a visiting professor of history at the University of Missouri in Kansas City and is now completing research in the Eisenhower Library in Abilene.

CAMPUS BULLETIN

Campus organizations are encouraged to use Campus Bulletin. All announcements must be submitted by 11 a.m. one day prior to publication. Announcements for Monday's bulletin must be in by 11 a.m. Friday. However, publication is determined by the amount of space available on a first-come, first-served basis and is not guaranteed. Information forms are available on the shelf outside Kedzie 118. Forms should be left in the box there after being filled out. All submissions must be signed and are subject to verification. Questions should be directed to the Collegian's campus editors in Kedzie 116.

Audience jumps for teaching

By Ingrid Erickson
Collegian Reporter

Teaching is the serendipity of life," said Christine Chalender, a speaker at the College of Education symposium Wednesday.

"The Changing Image of Teaching" was one of 17 sessions available to students interested in the education field. The symposium had 350 students registered, including 30 juniors and seniors from Westport High School in Kansas City, Mo.

Chalender, 1978 Kansas Teacher of the Year from Hays, has been teaching for 20 years and began her session with an exercise in which the audience jumped from their seats, repeatedly yelling, "Teach."

Since 1987, Chalender has given 350 presentations nationwide to motivate teachers about the changing field of education.

Chalender gave several guidelines to prospective teachers: "If you want to be a professional, you need to act like one." "Have a strong academic background, with command of the English language." "Keep current lesson plans." "Learning and teaching isn't a spectator sport. Like breathing you have to do it or you'll fall flat."

Today's schools are filled with children on drugs and alcohol and from broken homes, she said. Children mature at different rates, and teachers and the public must accept and help each child develop skills that will allow them to graduate from high school, Chalender said.

"We have to be willing to look beyond a student's surface and find a way to break through to them through love and nurture," Chalender said. "Our students don't fail, we fail them.

"Share what you know. Continue to grow. Teach."

She recommended that teachers be a member of organizations of their teaching field. Teachers should be innovative and creative, she said. No one solution will meet every child's needs; they should always keep in mind the quality of instruction a child experiences.

Salaries are increasing slowly, but Chalender is excited.

"Any school district that can pay more than $20,000 for a starting salary is a plus. It will spread and keep going up," Chalender said. This year, 60 percent of the nation's teaching force will be retiring, she said.

"The tremendous new crop of teachers makes me feel inadequate, the new teachers have a better command of education philosophy," Chalender said.

"I thought she was very inspiring with her analogies of teaching. She has a lot of good things to say about what the future looks like for teachers," said Kim Dawdy, junior in elementary education.

David Griffin Sr., the principal at Westport High School, brought 30 students interested in education to the symposium.

"It's an excellent opportunity for juniors and seniors to visit the campus and Manhattan," said Griffin, who is working on his doctoral degree in administration with an emphasis in business and communications.

"I came to the symposium to enhance my train of thought on teaching. The sessions are fun and interesting," said Willon Jasper, a junior at Westport High School.

Christians continue fighting in Lebanon

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Scores of people wounded in nine days of war between Lebanon's main Christian armies are dying in hospitals that have no power and little blood, medicine or clean water, police said Wednesday.

They said 365 people had been killed and 1,682 wounded since the battle for supremacy began Jan. 30 between nearly 20,000 soldiers commanded by rebel Gen. Michel Aoun and the Lebanese Forces militia of Samir Geagea, which has about 6,000 regulars and an estimated 30,000 reservists.

Many of the victims have been civilians, some of them Moslems killed or wounded by shells that strayed out of Christian territory.

On Wednesday, families in Christian east Beirut searched for relatives in hospitals where surgeons operated by candlelight.

Police said food was so short that some people fought over bread in Christian neighborhoods, where hundreds of thousands of people have spent a week or more in basements or bomb shelters.

Snipers from both sides fired overhead as the convoy dashed to evacuate the wounded, who included an 8-month-old baby with a head wound.

Symposium panel emphasizes care in teacher's role

By Laura Scroggins
Collegian Reporter

In order to learn in a positive environment, children need to know that educators care about them, said Michelle Tedrow, a Hutchinson grade school counselor.

This was the message at the Education Symposium's 9:30 a.m. session in the K-State Union titled, "Dealing With Students Having Troubled Home Situations."

A three-member panel led the session. The panel consisted of Fred Newton, director of University Counseling Services, Edie Jorns, social worker for the Unified School District 383, the Manhattan district, and Tedrow.

Jorns said children from troubled homes are considered "at risk."

During the panel discussion, Newton gave the definition of a troubled home.

The causes are a change in the family structure, drug or alcohol abuse, physical, emotional or sexual abuse, or a major life change, he said.

A major life change could be anything from a death in the family to continually moving and changing schools, Newton said. The average American only stays in one place for three years.

Other situations that may constitute a troubled home life are divorce and alcohol abuse.

"One-third of all children will experience divorce. Of those divorces, 60 percent of those parents have children under 18," Newton said.

He also added that the average age of children taking their first drink is 11½ years old.

"But that's the average age," he said. "That means a lot of them are taking those drinks before then."

The panel members said these disruptions in the home are causing the behavioral and learning problems that are on the increase in the grade schools.

"There is a reason behind all behavior," Jorns said.

Divorced or abusive parents who may have unrealistic expectations of their children may be contributing to this behavior. Parents with too many needs of their own take from the children rather than giving to them, she said.

"Children need to be nourished and nurtured," Jorns said.

Jorns spoke about two programs that had been experimented with during her years at USD 383. One was called Learning Is Fun Together. The Shortage of primates increases animals' value

By Bryan Ackley
Science Reporter

Apes and humans may share a common ancestor, but if chimpanzees could speak, they probably would not have many kind words for some of their distant, bipedal (human) relatives.

As friendly and lovable as they may seem to many humans, chimpanzees living in the wild are endangered animals, said Don Wixom, director of the Sunset Zoo.

Wild chimps can no longer be legally imported into the United States because increasing human populations in Africa and researchers' demands for non-human primates as laboratory animals have contributed to a serious decline in wild chimp populations, he said.

Consequently, many chimps in Sesa, a 1 1/2 year-old chimpanzee, shares a cell with its biological mother and father at Manhattan's Sunset Zoo. Sesa has been housed at the Sunset Zoo since she was born June 21, 1988.

zoo and research labs in the United States are more highly valued now than ever before by their human keepers, Wixom said.

For the five chimpanzees living at Sunset Zoo, this means that they, as well as the zoo's other primates, may someday be moving from their current home — the E.J. Frick Primate Building. They would be put into a new Primate Conservation Center, which would be constructed on the zoo's grounds.

"The Primate Conservation Center is still in the conceptual stage," Wixom said.

"It would include indoor and outdoor housing for all the primates," he said.

The PCC would make the chimps' living conditions more suitable for expanding and maintaining the integrity of their family unit, Wixom said.

One way zoos are trying to prevent chimp extinction is by breeding chimpanzees in captivity. Accomplishing that, however, is easier said than done, he said.

For example, Mac, the only adult male chimp at the zoo, was part of an animal act in St. Louis before he came to Manhattan, Wixom said.

By the time he finished his extensive career, Mac had yet to learn how to breed, and the odds against him learning how were not in his favor, he said.

"Mac learned how to breed by watching rhesus monkeys," Wixom said. "It's just amazing that he was able to do it."

Biomedical researchers are equally concerned about saving the species, said Leo Whitehair, director of Animal Research Resources for the National Institutes of Health.

Although the NIH sponsors seven Regional Primate Research Centers, he said only one of the RPRCs uses chimpanzees — about 200 of them — as lab animals.

"There are only 2,100 chimpanzees in the entire country," Whitehair said.

"That number includes all chimpanzees in zoos, exhibits and the 1,300 that are used in the entire

Racism alive and well in United States

"I am the spirit that always denies." German poet and dramatist Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832)

As young men are apt to do during periods of idleness, they search for amusement. Six young, southern college men found amusement one evening in December by forming a club. They met under cover of darkness — all the more to enhance the secrecy and mysticism of their kuklos, or circle. Their ceremonial garb: pure, white cloaks and hoods. The amusement: terrorizing poor, credulous, black farmers. The year: 1865. The place: the small town of Pulaski, in Giles County, Tennessee. And the club — the Ku Klux Klan.

At its height, which was approximately 1889 to 1940, the Klan was responsible for more than 3,800 lynchings.

Contemplation of the history of the black man in America calls to mind the words of French journalist and novelist Alphonse Karr (1808-1890): "The more things change, the more they are the same." We have seen some significant changes in the civil rights of blacks in this country in the last 30 years. Yet, there is recent evidence to indicate the attitude of whites toward blacks in the United States is not much different than it was 125 years ago.

Part of the problem can be seen in an article published Dec. 6, 1989, in the Collegian, and written by Collegian columnist John Mussman; a commentary entitled, "Racism Problems Distorted by Media Hype." He said, "K-State definitely has a problem with racism. But what exactly is the problem? The problem at K-State is that every other day we read about racism — both real and alleged — and everyone gets agitated. ... It is an unnecessary effect caused by extended media hype."

Ignorance and denial of the facts are as much contributing factors in perpetuating racism in our society as are lynchings, mail bombs, and burning crosses.

Please don't misunderstand, it is not totally John's fault. When you have a man, who, while president, asserted there were no poor and homeless people in America, you begin to realize denial and ignorance are much more pervasive than John's comments would indicate. But then, Ronald Reagan's America was largely "media hype" anyway.

Just three days prior to John's column, the Associated Press reported the Wichita White Knights, a Wichita-based klavern of the national Invisible Empire, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, was sponsoring a "Wichita Dial-A-Racist" phone message. The three-minute message said if callers wanted to become "white political activists" they could contact the White Knights at a Wichita or Buhler post office box. The message also said, "The really neat thing about AIDS is 70 percent of those killed are nonwhite. Yea for AIDS ... We may be looking at an all-white, all-heterosexual America. ... Yea for AIDS."

I contacted the Wichita AP bureau to get

Brad Seabourn

the number and thereby obtain a first-hand recording of this garbage. But the Invisible Empire, true to its name, had vanished — the number, (316) 262-2183, was disconnected. Oh well, it was just "media hype."

Just three days after John's column, an editorial by Ted Frederickson appeared in the Kansas City Times. Frederickson related a joke told by then director of the Kansas Bureau of Investigation Dave Johnson, in which Johnson used the phrase "buck nigger" to accentuate the punch line to a joke about a black man making love to a racist white man's wife. Within hours of the appearance of the article, Johnson resigned as director of the KBI. Of course, this too was "media hype."

It would seem Johnson and former Klan leader David Duke possess a similar sense of humor. In 1978, Wayne King, a New York Times reporter, conducted an interview with Duke for a PBS special titled "The New Klan." An excerpt is as follows:

King: You sell things. You pass out things called "Nigger Huntin' Licence". ...

Duke: No, we do not. I do not pass out — I do not ...

King: You do not, but your lieutenants do. Maybe you do. It came from Louis Beam. ...

Duke: Well, I don't ...

King: He's your Grand Dragon, isn't he? Duke: No. He's a Great Titan.

King: It says, "HAVING PAID THE LICENSE FEE (SOMEBODY'S NAME) IS HEREBY LICENSED TO HUNT AND KILL NIGGERS," in caps, "DURING THE OPEN SEASON IN TEXAS." This is beautiful, David. ...

Duke: Well, it is a joke. Yes, it is satire. I know, I know, more "media hype."

Jane Alford, Washburn University instructor, made a slip of the tongue in her Jan. 6 Correctional Treatment for Sex Offenders class when she referred to Martin Luther King Day as "Martin Luther Coon Day." Again, just "media hype."

Within the last month, an unknown group has taken responsibility for mail bombs that killed a federal judge and civil rights lawyer. This group has threatened future assassinations "any time a black man rapes a white woman." Is it still "media hype?"

Last March, Andre Roland, a 14-year-old black youth from Columbia, Mo., was found hanging from a tree near his home. His family and many others contend his death was racially motivated because he had been threatened by whites in his school for dating a white girl. Another case of "media hype?"

It is extremely naive to think K-State is somehow immune to these events and the racism that fosters them. Racism is very much alive and well in America and in Manhattan. The incident at Bushwacker's last summer is symptomatic of the fear and hatred just beneath the friendly exterior of many white people.

Contrary to what John Mussman would have you do, if you want to find racism, don't look in supermarkets or the movie theater, or the student union. Rather, look at college athletics, where black athletes are used and then discarded without ever receiving an education from a largely white educational system. Look to the housing industry, where real estate agents still surreptitiously push blacks into "black" neighborhoods.

Look to our prisons, which have a disproportionately high number of blacks. Look to cities such as Boston, where a single, sick mind can dupe an entire community into racial hatred and paranoia. Look in a few mail boxes, or open a few special packages. Look to the trees, which still seem to find an occasional black youth, who had every reason to live, hanging by a rope.

The FBI recently ruled the death of Andre Roland a suicide. He probably killed himself to stir up a little "media hype."

Exchange of opinions might produce library

Call it a library summit. President Jon Wefald and representatives of the KSU Foundation, the Board of Regents, Student Senate, and the Farrell Library staff, all interested students, faculty, staff and community members could take an afternoon and just sit down together to talk about Farrell.

The participants could express their views about the problems facing the library and propose solutions. It could be a brainstorming session, where no proposal is too ridiculous. Those in positions to make changes could get a better idea of what the library staff and library users want.

Ideally, a coordinated plan of action to improve the library would arise from the summit. Instead of the sarcastic remarks made out of frustration and ambiguous statements, administrators, regents and Foundation members could present a united front to the governor and the legislature.

There is no disagreement about the need for improvements to the library. Now the University community needs to come to an agreement about how to accomplish what needs to be done.

No media would have to be present to justify the importance of the event. It's time to discuss the library in a reasonable and open manner. Showing the government that the University has a rational plan to improve the library may win more support than the current impetuous demand for the immediate delivery of millions of dollars to fund an addition.

Lobby day offers hope

It's time for a friendly K-State action update. We may not be a bunch of '60s campus radicals, but there's going to be some demonstrating-type stuff going on around here real soon. And because the demonstration would seem to be on behalf of the student body, I figured you might want to know the basic who-what-when-where-why-how stuff. I mean, if people are going to go to Topeka and tell the government-types what I want, well, I want to know just exactly what it is that I'm wanting. I might even want to go along and fill in some legislators myself.

Well, here's the scoop: I'm going to start with "what" because otherwise you won't know what I'm talking about. The "what" is Lobby Day, when students from all the regents universities converge on Topeka and ask for money. But wait, I can hear you saying, "Our University has money. They have my tuition and my athletic fee!" Well, that's where the problem comes in. The state has your tuition. (We do have your athletic fee, but that's not the issue.) The state has your tuition and they won't give it back, partially because of something called a "circuit breaker."

A "circuit breaker" gives money back to small businesses and homeowners who can't afford to pay the higher taxes that resulted from the reappraisal thing everybody was talking about this fall. It's a lovely and generous idea, but don't applaud the government yet; they cut our budget to finance this little piece of philanthropy. Presumably that's where part of your tuition is. And you thought President Wefald's wife was using it to buy shoes.

The other reason the state has your tuition and won't give it back is something called a "fee release," which we pretty much didn't get. Usually, after you pay fees, the state gives some of the money back to the University in order to hire faculty members in times of large increases in enrollment, like now. This year, the state skipped that part, which in part explains why lots of students went to classes on the first day only to find that those classes didn't exist. This is not to mention one or two other minor little budget cuts that we just haven't noticed yet. Wait until you see next year's line schedule. If you didn't get nailed this year, they're not done yet.

Basically, the objective of Lobby Day, which is being sponsored by Associated Students of Kansas, is to ask for that money back and to see to it this doesn't happen again next year. Specifically what ASK supports, and therefore what students represented by ASK support, is full funding of enrollment adjustments and fee releases, maintenance of the base budgets of Regents Institutions and full funding of the Educational Building Fund, among other issues.

ASK also strongly supports the Margin of Excellence, which gives our University money to help bring it up to the level of its peers. I know, if you hear Farrell Library mentioned one more time you're going to scream. But we're behind in other areas as well. For example, we rank 42nd in average salary of professors among 50 land grant universities, and we only rank that high because of MOE. Before the 1989 MOE allocation, we ranked 47th.

"Who" would seem to be anybody who wants to go (that's important, because that could be you and I'll tell you "how" later), and some Student Senate and Legislative Affairs Committee members. Now don't get all prejudiced on me — I checked this out, and contrary to popular rumor, they're not all greek and they're not all massive student overachievers who raise their hands and ask complicated questions two minutes before the bell rings. Most of them tend to be ... normal, and even ... nice. But don't tell anybody I said so.

"When" is two times — one for Lobby Day and once for practice. Lobby Day is Monday, Feb. 19. It is, according to the Legislative Affairs Committee, an all-University excused activity. Basically, any professor that objects must like the tax break he or she is getting from that low salary. The "training session" is Monday, Feb. 12, at 7 p.m. in Union 213.

The "How" gives you two choices — you can be a member of a lobby team, in which case you would have to attend the training session (where they'll fill you in on all sorts of stuff including what to say), or you can attend the rally at 10 a.m. at the capital. The governor will speak and the press will be there, so that's where we really need to be impressive. Tons of folks would really help. For that, you don't need any training, just an enthusiastic body. If you're interested, or actually planning on going, all you have to do is show up at the Student Government Services office in time to hitch a ride to Topeka that Monday morning at 8:15. If you need more information, call the SGS office or attend the meeting next Monday.

I think we pretty much covered the "why" along the "what," so that's all I have to say about Lobby Day, except for one thing. If you care about the University and the quality of your education, or even if you just want to see K-State on par with the University of Kansas, you'll be at that rally with bells on. Legislators don't seem to listen to people our age because we don't have a very high voting rate and they don't think we care. This time, let's show them we do.

Wait — a suggestion — if you go to the rally, wear purple. Just because we're supporting funding for all higher education doesn't mean we don't want them to know who we are.

Honors programs offer students opportunities

By Amy D. Hadlock
Collegian Reporter

Honors programs at K-State can help create opportunities for exceptional students.

"The honors program can be a very broadening experience," said Michael Donnelly, assistant dean for honors in the College of Arts and Sciences and associate professor of English.

"We try to set up an honors program that is most beneficial for the student," said Kay Stewart, assistant dean in the business college.

Business honors students are required to have a 3.5 grade point average and a composite score of 26 on the American Collegiate Testing Program. After these criteria are met, they are able to enroll in the honors classes.

Honors business classes have a bit of a different twist from some of the other colleges' honors classes, Stewart said.

"Each class elects an executive council member. The executive council members then meet and decide on the classroom topic," Stewart said.

The students can use different methods to present the topic, such as a speaker or a film.

"This type of honors class promotes responsibility in the honors students since they choose the topic and how to present it," Stewart said.

Students also benefit in several ways from the honors classes, Stewart said. Because each class chooses its own topic, the students may learn something they might not have learned in an ordinary class.

"Students develop leadership skills, are exposed to topics of interest and are able to interact with each other," Stewart said.

The College of Arts and Sciences also has an unusual approach to the honors program.

The students are able to gain experience and learn from the wide array of classes, Donnelly said.

An ACT score of 28 and an interview allow students to be in the arts and sciences honors program.

"The interview gives a chance to meet the student and show that the student is interested and committed to the program," Donnelly said.

During their freshman year, the students take an honors orientation class and Honors Composition I and II, plus one other honors class.

They continue taking honors courses in their sophomore and junior years, then write a thesis during their senior year.

Students can benefit from many opportunities in the honors program, Donnelly said.

"The students experience interaction with intellectuals and may learn something different in honors classes than in the basic class," said Donnelly.

Students may also have valuable memories from the honors program, Donnelly said.

"I hope the students can look back and have experienced life in a more intellectual and broader view," Donnelly said.

There are several honors societies open to the honor student. Phi Beta Kappa is the oldest and one of the most prestigious groups recognizing high scholastic achievement, said Robert F. Kruh, vice provost for academic service.

"K-State got its Phi Beta Kappa chapter in 1974," Kruh said. "There are only two Phi Beta Kappa chapters in the state of Kansas, one at K-State

Diplomat suspended from duty

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Felix S. Bloch, the career diplomat suspected by U.S. authorities of spying for the Soviet Union, was formally suspended Wednesday and stripped of his $80,000 annual salary, the State Department announced.

Deputy spokesman Richard Boucher said the department also is proposing to fire Bloch.

The moves were the latest chapter in a saga that began eight months ago when Bloch, 54, was placed on administrative leave with pay after he reportedly had been videotaped passing a suitcase to a Soviet agent in Paris.

Efforts to reach Bloch on Wednesday were unsuccessful. In the past, he repeatedly has passed up chances to deny the allegations, saying instead the government has not been able to bring charges, much less prove them. He also has not returned telephone calls from reporters in the past.

Boucher refused to provide details of the action taken Wednesday. The suspension took effect at the close of business Wednesday.

Bloch has 30 days to answer the charges and submit any information to show why he should be restored to duty. He may request a hearing.

Bloch, an urbane diplomat who has spent more than 30 years in the foreign service, has not been prosecuted. There have been unofficial reports that the Justice Department believes its case against him is not strong enough to seek an indictment.

Riley County to close landfill by July

University needs to locate waste disposal alternative

By Chris McEntee
Collegian Reporter

The state's order to Riley County to close the landfill by June 30, 1991, means the University will have to start looking for a new place to dump its trash.

All campus trash, with the exceptions of carcass offal from Weber Hall and food scraps from the food centers, goes directly to the Riley County landfill, said Al Seely, physical plant supervisor of facilities management.

National By-Products Inc. of Nebraska collects all non-edible products from Weber Hall twice a week, said Lyell Nelson, animal sciences meat lab manager. Hides are salted and shipped to be tanned and the non-edible products are used by companies for dog food, cat food and other animal feed.

Bill Neilson, of Five Way Hog Farm 22 in Riley County, collects about nine tubs of vegetable refuse from the preparation rooms of Derby and Kramer food centers two or three times a week to use for hog feed, he said.

For regular trash, Facilities Management has two trash trucks of its own — one 1988 Volvo, used for everyday collections, and an older model that is used when there is a large amount of trash to be picked up, Seely said.

During a normal day, the trucks are taken to the landfill twice. The facility crews make five or six trips each day when they are busy between semesters and at the end of the year.

The cost per truckload usually is about $80 to $120, Seely said. The landfill charges by the cubic yard so the cost varies.

"In fiscal year 1988-89, 8,840 compacted cubic yards of waste were taken to the landfill from the University," Seely said.

When the Riley County landfill closes in 1991, Seely said the University would probably deliver the trash to the new landfill site.

Dan Harden, Riley County engineer, said the county may decide in mid-March where the new landfill will be.

"Right now we are looking at one site in Fort Riley and another site west of Junction City, on the Geary-Dickinson county line," he said.

The Fort Riley location, which would mean a shorter hauling distance, would save residents money, Harden said.

About 60,000 people use the landfill services, and one-third of the total volume is from the University, Harden said.

Exhibit portrays human existence on canvas

REVIEW

In a statement accompanying her show, "Figures," Eileen Dailey describes the canvas as "a residue of human activity in which human life and spirit either survives when in balance with the environment or is destroyed by imbalance."

This residue, a snapshot of a moment of time, is characteristic of Dailey's work, which is on display in the K-State Union Art Gallery until Feb. 23.

Dailey's "snapshots" embrace a wide spectrum of emotions. "Three Graces #1," 1984, depicts the joyful human graffiti of three women dancing. A blaze of blues, reds and violets evokes a feeling of rapid motion and music.

At the other end of the spectrum, "The Earth Clears Herself," 1988, portrays a painful moment in time. A human figure, surrounded by darkness, strains toward a small light source in the corner.

The figure seems to shriek in agony as a cleansing process takes place. Perhaps this work symbolizes the difficulty attached to saving our environment.

"Opening the Eyes," 1988, again conveys darker feelings. This oil-on-canvas work depicts two human figures in a similar defensive posture — one superimposed on a gloomy blue-gray background and the other with a busy violet backdrop. The title and the body language of the figures seem to represent a fear of new ideas.

Similar postures are echoed in "Sailor's Warning," 1985. The figures of two women, facing away from one another, seem to wait on the shore — represented by horizontal canvas strips at the bottom of the piece. One figure stands motionless and the other seems to dance. Both have hands raised in what may be interpreted either as a greeting or a fearful gesture.

Dailey's anxious brushstrokes in the background of "Touch," 1986, convey a sense of conflict and urgency in the air as one figure reaches to touch another. Again, the figures do not face one another, which may describe a lack of understanding between the two — a condition that one figure may be trying to

Second-half rally lifts Lady Cats

By Scott Paske
Sports Reporter

Lady Cat senior Rita Matteucci attempted to summarize the philosophy of her teammates after Wednesday's game with Nebraska at Bramlage Coliseum.

"Being down by 14 points doesn't mean a whole lot to this team," Matteucci said.

It's a good thing. K-State, the Big Eight leader through the first half of the conference schedule, rallied from a 35-21 deficit at intermission to beat the seventh-place Cornhuskers, 60-58.

The game was definitely a tale of two halves. In the opening 20 minutes, the Lady Cats shot 30 percent (8-of-27), missed 10 layups and committed 15 turnovers.

"It was not a pretty first half," K-State coach Gaye Griffin said. "I hope we never have to go through any more like that again."

Griffin would probably take a lot more of what she got after her half-time talk. K-State hit 15-of-17 free throws in the second half, outrebounded the 'Huskers and forced 20 NU turnovers — several in the opening minutes.

"The first five minutes of the second half we pretty well dominated them," Griffin said. "I thought that was a key part. We came back out and controlled the whole ball game."

Early in the game, K-State looked anything but in control. Nebraska used full-court zone pressure to spark a 12-0 run and led, 18-9. Sophomore guard Mary Jo Miller hit a 17-footer at the 9:58 mark to end a 4-minute scoring drought.

The 'Huskers built the lead to 15 points on two occasions on a pair of baskets by Kelly Hubert. The junior forward's layup with 4:07 remaining in the half gave Nebraska a 31-16 lead.

Hubert and 6-foot-1 junior Ann Halsne led the 'Huskers with 13 points apiece.

Meanwhile, K-State's top two scorers, Diana Miller and Nadira Hazim, combined for just three first-half points on 1-of-11 shooting.

"Our problems weren't with our defense," Matteucci said. "It was just because we weren't making our shots. We knew they eventually would start falling."

Matteucci's forecast wasn't totally accurate, but it was close enough. K-State hit 36 percent after halftime, but used some full-court pressure of its own and offensive rebounding to fuel the comeback.

The Lady Cats held Nebraska scoreless for the first 3½ minutes and began chipping away at the lead. At the 12:06 mark, a pair of free throws by Kristie Bahner gave K-State its first lead in over 20 minutes at 39-38.

Nebraska stormed back with a 12-3 run over the next four minutes. Halsne's bank shot with 8:15 remaining gave the 'Huskers a 50-42 lead.

However, Hazim sparked a final K-State comeback. The 5-7 junior scored back-to-back buckets to cut the lead to 50-48. After she tied the game at 54-54 with a pair of free throws, Bahner hit a jump shot to give the Lady Cats the lead for good with 3:33 remaining.

"We got back and tied it and then boom, we were seven or eight points down," Griffin said. "We kept fighting and, finally, the third time was a charm."

"That's the sign of a Big Eight champion-type team."

K-State, 16-6 overall and 8-1 in the Big Eight, was led by Bahner's 17 points. Matteucci added 15 and Hazim 10.

Nebraska fell to 10-12 and 2-7. Missouri, who defeated K-State 69-54 in Columbia, Mo., on Sunday, stayed a game behind the Lady Cats in the conference standings with a 58-55 win over Colorado Wednesday night. The Tigers improved to 16-6 and 7-2.

KU, OU get wins on road

By The Associated Press

In Big Eight Conference basketball action Wednesday night, No. 2 Kansas picked up a big road victory at Oklahoma State, 83-76; while Oklahoma also won on the road, pulling out an 86-81 win at Iowa State.

In Stillwater, Okla., Kevin Pritchard made two 3-pointers and Mark Randall added three field goals in a 16-8 run in the first four minutes of the second half as Kansas built a 52-32 lead. The Jayhawks (23-1, 6-1) stretched the lead to 24 on three occasions, the final time at 60-36 on Rick Calloway's jumper with 10:21 left.

But Mattias Sahlstrom scored 10 points and Byron Houston seven as Oklahoma State (13-8, 4-5) rallied to 75-69 with 2:16 remaining. Kansas helped the Cowboys by missing the front end of three one-and-ones.

However, four free throws by Pritchard and two by Jeff Guelndner gave the Jayhawks an 81-70 lead and breathing room with 1:29 remaining.

Pritchard scored 17 points and Calloway had 15. Kansas won for the sixth straight time in Stillwater and has beaten Oklahoma State in 15 of the past 16 meetings.

In Ames, Iowa, Skeeter Henry scored 25 points, including the go-ahead basket with 2:14 left, and No. 13 Oklahoma held off Iowa State for the victory.

Iowa State, which lost to No. 1-ranked Missouri 95-93 a week ago, had a chance to tie the game when Doug Collins got a one-and-one free throw chance with 5.1 seconds left and the Cyclones trailing 82-80. But he made only one shot and Oklahoma sank four free throws in the final seconds to secure the victory.

Damon Patterson added 19 points for Oklahoma and Tony Martin scored 10 as the Sooners improved to 16-3 overall and 5-2 in the Big Eight.

'Cats to face Tigers

By David Svoboda
Sports Reporter

The setting: Bramlage Coliseum/Sports Medicine Center, Manhattan.

The patient: Coach Lon Kruger's men's basketball team, losers of three straight Big Eight Conference games.

The cure: A home victory in front of 13,500 fans and a national television audience.

The physicians: No. 1 ranked Missouri.

Looks like the right clinic but the wrong doctors. Lon. Norm Stewart isn't exactly Dr. Feelgood, and his merry band of interns make Hawkeye and Trapper John look tame.

"This is not the kind of club you can get well on," Kruger said.

But the Tigers will be the only doctors in the house tonight at 6:10 in Bramlage, and the nation will be watching them work. Kruger might need a trip to the still in the swamp after the game is over.

In Kruger's three-plus seasons as coach, K-State had lost three consecutive contests only once before and had never dropped more than two straight in league play.

And to expect them to miraculously turn things around against the nation's best team might be asking for a bit much. But recent home history is on K-State's side.

You remember last season's battle in Bramlage between the felines, don't you? After watching a 45-34 halftime edge vanish, K-State players and fans watched as Tony Massop turned defeat into victory with one deft movement of his hand.

With time running down and K-State trailing 75-74, Steve Henson rose above the Tiger defense, launched a guarded jumper, and listened as the Bramlage crowd fell deathly quiet.

As the ball rimmed off, an audible moan turned instantly into a deafening roar as Massop bolted from the wing, shot his arm into the air and tipped in the miss, giving K-State the 76-75 win that probably sewed up the team's third straight trip to the NCAA tournament.

But Mizzou's chief of surgery, Stewart, wasn't in the building at the time. He was at home recovering from colon cancer and bleeding ulcers. He's since returned to battle, fit as can be.

Two years ago, Missouri had the honor of helping K-State close 38 years of magic in Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats won that matchup 92-82, and during the course of the game Kruger and Stewart squared off at midcourt for a verbal showdown that will be long remembered by those who witnessed it from the stands of the "barn."

Memories, however, mean nothing today. If they did, K-State might be in for even more trouble than it bargained for. Missouri, even with the heroics of the past two games in Manhattan having gone against them, has won 10 of the last 13 meetings between the two schools.

The reality of the 1989-90 season finds K-State with a 12-10 mark overall and a 2-4 record in the Big Eight. Missouri is 21-1 and 7-0.

And the recent three-game losing streak has Kruger and Henson understandably bothered.

"This has obviously been a difficult stretch, and it's going to get more difficult," Kruger said. "And that's a bit scary."

"Right now we're a little bit down and a little bit frustrated, I would think," Henson said. "Lately we've been searching for answers on things other than Xs and Os."

The team asking the questions tonight features what basically is a three-guard, two-big-man lineup.

The guards are Lee Coward, Anthony Peeler and John McIntyre (no relation to the aforementioned Trapper). It's Peeler, the 6-4 sophomore from Kansas City, Mo., that concerns Kruger the most.

Peeler is averaging a team-leading 18.9 points a contest. Askia Jones, who has started the past six games for K-State, will draw the initial defensive assignment against him.

"We might try a lot of people on Peeler," Kruger said. "The initial assignment would go to Ski. He's had some eye-opening experiences as a freshman, and he's handled them well."

The big men are Doug Smith and Nathan Buntin. Smith is second on the team in scoring with a 17.7 point average, and Buntin would be a strong candidate for Comeback Player of the Year honors, if such an award was given in the conference.

After strong freshman and sophomore seasons, Buntin struggled through his junior year with a 4.6 point per game average. He's more than tripled that this season, averaging 15.5 points each time out.

"They're obviously not the kind of ballclub where you can just take something away and disturb them," Kruger said.

If a weapon or two can be silenced, Kruger's team might have a chance to knock off its eighth-ranked team since the former K-State guard became coach.

The highest ranked teams a Kruger-coached club ever knocked off were a pair of No. 3 Oklahoma squads — in 1987-88 and again this year.

"This has been the time where we've stepped up and surprised some people in the past," Henson said.

And if the Wildcats can win tonight?

"It would do a lot for confidence purposes, as a team," Henson said.

And it just might help the patient leave the clinic under his own power.

Russell big hit as 'Husker

By Dan Wicker
Sports Reporter

It seems ironic that the first two points scored in Wednesday night's game between K-State and Nebraska at Bramlage Coliseum were from Nebraska guard Carol Russell.

Russell was not only playing against K-State but also against her home town.

The sophomore from Manhattan opted to travel the road to Lincoln instead of playing at K-State after a distinguished and successful career at Manhattan High School.

As a Lady Indian, Russell averaged 14 points a game and set records in scoring, assists and rebounds while earning a berth on the all-state squad as a senior.

Russell admitted that choosing between Nebraska and K-State was one of the hardest decisions she has made, but she has no regrets — even though her father is employed by K-State and her brothers both went to K-State.

66

— Carol Russell
Nebraska guard

"It was a very difficult decision, but I liked Nebraska and it offered what I wanted," Russell said.

The K-State game is one that Russell is always excited about, being from Manhattan. She also receives a lot more attention from the crowd than usual, and she says that makes it easier to play.

She did point out, however, that Nebraska has a traveling crowd with them on the road, but said it is nice to play in her hometown.

"Since I am from Manhattan, I am more excited," Russell said. "It (the crowd) felt good. I wish we could have come off with a win, but it was nice."

In Wednesday's contest, Russell went 3-for-5 from the field and 1-for-2 from the free-throw line, tallying seven points and pulling down two rebounds.

Besides playing in Nebraska, Russell has also made another change this season — the transition from playing forward in high school to being a point guard with the Cornhuskers.

"(The move from high school to college) is a lot harder and tougher," Russell said. "I've also moved to a point guard, which, once you get into the flow of it, is all right. It's new, but I like it."

Russell saw only limited action as a freshman at Nebraska, but has progressed enough to gain a spot in the starting lineup this year. She has become a quiet leader on the floor for the Huskers, making significant improvements especially in her passing and rebounding in the last few games.

In the past three games, Russell has grabbed 10 rebounds and dished out 15 assists.

Ex-Manhattan High School star Carol Russell, was back in town as Nebraska's starting point guard Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

Cars represent past student projects

By Clinton Wolf
Collegian Reporter

Call them the Ghosts of Energy Crises Past or, perhaps, of Energy Crises Future.

They are two cars which will never have to pull up to a gas pump. They would rather be at home plugged into an outlet.

The cars are electric.

The two cars sit in storage behind the police station in West Stadium. One is a 1969 Renault police patrol car. The other is a Bradley GT II.

They were a student project conducted by the Department of Engineering Technology between 1982 and 1985, said Art Vaughan, who headed the project for the department.

The Renault belongs to the K-State Police, said Charles Beckom, police chief.

The Bradley belongs to the engineering technology department, said William Dawes, associate professor of engineering technology.

A two-seat sports car, the Bradley was never completed, Vaughan said. Originally it was to have two touch screen computers that would provide touch control of accessories such as lights and wipers.

"We got it to the 80 percent (completion) stage, but I left K-State and it fell on the ground after that," he said.

James Hague, assistant professor of engineering technology, said students in his department plan to update the car for the All-University Open House April 7. Batteries recently developed specifically for electric

KPL to donate rechargeable electric van for research by College of Engineering

By Clinton Wolf
Collegian Reporter

One of 500 electric cargo vans produced by General Motors Corp. will be donated to the College of Engineering next fall.

Called the G-Van, it is a standard GM cargo van fitted with rechargeable batteries, an electric traction motor and a single-speed transmission. It can go from 0 to 30 in 13 seconds and travel 60 miles on an overnight charge, according to promotional literature.

The Department of Engineering Technology is writing a proposal to conduct research on the van for KPL Gas Service, which will be donating the van to the University. John Johannes, KPL district manager, said the van is one of four KPL has purchased at $32,500 each. The other three will be operated by KPL.

Johannes said eight of the vans have been purchased by utilities in Kansas for research purposes.

John Ulrich, professor of engineering technology, said the van would be incorporated into senior student experiments should the department's proposal be accepted.

"We will be doing research on it for KPL for a period over at least a year," Ulrich said.

The research will focus primarily on daily usage of the electric vehicle, he said. It may be used for mail service or as transportation, or for any similar duty which will require at least 60 miles of driving per day.

Such aspects as battery longevity and acceleration performance as the batteries discharge will be studied, Ulrich said.

"Basically we will be conducting an overall study of a 60-mile radius vehicle," Ulrich said.

James Hague, assistant professor of engineering technology, said the van would be most useful for carrier service in towns.

"(Electric cargo vehicles) could even be mandated in California if this is successful," he said.

Hague is writing the proposal for the research. He said the department could possibly combine research on the van with research done on an electric car the department already owns. The car is a Bradley GT II that is stored uncompleted in West Stadium. Engineering technology students will be working to get it operational for the All-University Open House, Hague said.

Ulrich said General Motors is putting the vehicles out for testing across the country and that many utilities are interested in studying the effect electric-powered vehicles can have on their market.

If electric cars, vans and trucks become commonplace, utilities may need to develop metering machines for recharging the vehicles, Ulrich said. These machines could be installed along streets or at enough to avoid the explosion hazard would cost about $500 to $600 every three months, he said.

Vaughan said the idea of an electric car seemed good at the time, especially to the former Director of Security and Traffic Art Stone. During the early 1980s, Stone faced a fixed budget and high gas prices, he said. This made patrolling the campus with a gasoline-powered vehicle economically difficult.

"But there was no charge for the electricity he used," Vaughan said.

The Renault had been donated to the College of Engineering by Kansas Power and Light Co. Stone saw the car and became interested in it as a patrol vehicle.

Vaughan said that he put the idea before his students, they thought it would be a good project for the upcoming open house.

"It worked quite well," Vaughan said.

Beckom said now the car must be monitored while it charges overnight, or screened off to protect people in case of an explosion.

"Right now we don't have any way to screen the car off while we're charging it," Beckom said. "I can't afford let it charge overnight without someone being there."

Use of the car has also been limited by quick depletion of the batteries. But the project has not been abandoned, Beckom said.

"We use it during the summer for parking lot patrol primarily," Beckom said. "It's ideal for use in

Computer facilitates tracking processes

By Shannan Seely
Collegian Reporter

Police officials from the K-State campus to Los Angeles and New York use a common method of tracking down wanted criminals and recovering stolen property.

They are able to do this through the use of a crime computer containing a massive database called the National Crime Information Computer. The NCIC is used for both entering and retrieving stolen property identification numbers across the United States and in some governmental sanctioned countries, including Panama.

The files contains driver's license numbers; state names; property and identification numbers; date and time stolen; police case numbers; and the name of the reporting agency. The network also contains files on all missing or wanted persons.

When a police officer retrieves suspected stolen merchandise, they can look through the computer listing and then directly communicate to the agency who reported the items stolen. The process usually takes three to four seconds.

"It tries to be fail safe," said Charles Beckom, chief of campus police.

If the stolen property is not recorded to the NCIC within 12 hours and removed from the missing list, the Federal Bureau of Investigation then contacts the delinquent agency, Beckom said. This situation is rare, however.

"A year ago, there was a number of thefts and a small percentage that had serial numbers could be traced," he said. "We could talk to the Topeka, Kansas City and Wichita police departments about the items with the serial numbers."

The computer system has been improved in the last several years.

"This process used to take more than half a day, and now it just takes seconds," he said.

Additional information is expected to be added to the system in the future.

"The next newest item to help crime is the concept of storing fingerprints in the computer system," Beckom said. "Los Angeles police are installing it right now. A scanner can be used to pick up the person's fingerprints right at the scene of the crime."

Fingerprint transmission technology is becoming more common, and K-State may consider adding the feature in the future.

"Maybe in 10 to 20 years, K-State will have one," he said.

Each state has a database to store license plate numbers and other information too numerous for the national network. The Kansas Bureau of Investigation in Topeka is the main office of the Kansas system.

Riley County Police Lt. Scott Campbell said he estimated the RCPD may use services of the NCIC more than 100 times each day.

"The NCIC has a wide range of uses, but its primary function is recovering stolen property," Campbell said. "A dispatcher at the police department can do it routinely for patrol officers, administrators and investigators."

The NCIC assists the RCPD several times each week in making routine arrests and for recovering stolen items, Campbell said.

"There is no other way, other than making individual phone calls to a particular agency, for recovering stolen property."

Compulsive exercising abuses health

Obsession with perfection, appearance cited as reasons for destructive effort

By The Collegian Staff

As Amy walks to her next class, she isn't cramming for next hour's test, gossiping with her friends or even trying to decide what to wear on an upcoming date.

"When I walk down the halls, I think about squeezing my butt and keeping my stomach tucked in," she said. "I even think about moving my legs in class. Sometimes I think that does some good, but I know it doesn't."

Amy is a sophomore at a Kansas high school, but asked not to have her full name used or her home town identified.

Amy said if she doesn't exercise every chance she gets, she feels "like the Pillsbury dough girl."

This summer, Amy said she got up everyday at 6 a.m. to swim for an hour. Then she rode her bicycle and did aerobics before work.

Over her lunch hour, she swam as practice for her spot on the swim team.

After work, Amy swam laps for half an hour or so and then went home to ride her stationary bike before bed.

Amy looks healthy. Although she may be only too self-motivated, she is destroying her mind and body. Amy has been diagnosed as a compulsive exerciser.

Robbin Walder, therapist at Pawnee Mental Health Center, said compulsive exercising affects young women most because of social pressures.

"It has a lot to do with the secondary position women have taken in society — that we have to work twice as hard to get half as far," Walder said.

"It's the idea that women have to achieve perfection in order to be accepted and loved," she said.

Compulsive exercisers are not so much concerned about their health as they are about their appearance, Walder said.

"The way I look is all people see," Amy said. "That's what they care about, so I have to keep it up."

"You're not doing this for yourself," she said. "You're burning yourself out for everyone else."

Compulsive exercise starts out as a simple self-improvement effort. When it escalates into an obsession, mental destruction begins.

"Problems begin when the exercise is in charge of you, instead of you being in charge of the exercise," Walder said.

"Exercising is just one more way to purge the body," she said. "Whether fasting, starving, vomiting, using laxatives or diuretics, it all takes on the same kinds of qualities."

Walder said eating disorders often accompany compulsive exercising.

In junior high, Amy said she began running extra miles after track practice. During her freshman year of high school, bulimia set in.

Brad Begnoche, a physical therapist at Physical Therapy Center in Manhattan, said muscular and skeletal injuries occur with over-exercising, whether compulsive or not. The end result could range from stress fractures to tendon and muscle injuries.

Debate continues over whether low body fat levels cause abnormal menstrual cycles, said Robert Kraemer, assistant professor of physical education and leisure studies.

"You can't say that below-normal levels of body fat will cause abnormal menstrual cycles, although there are studies that suggest that," he said. "There have been cases where women have lower than normal body fat, and they still have normal menstrual cycles."

In fall 1989, Amy underwent counseling for compulsive exercising and bulimia. For three weeks, she wasn't allowed to exercise. She was put on a 1,300 calorie diet and lost weight.

"(The counselors) wanted to prove to me that I could lose weight without exercising," Amy said.

"But when I was in the hospital, I lost a lot of muscle, and that bothered me because I could feel myself jiggle when I walked, and I can't stand that."

Amy said it was difficult not to fall back into the same destructive patterns when she left the hospital.

"When I got home, I just really had to concentrate on keeping it to a minimum. I would feel myself start to lose control again," she said.

Amy doesn't believe she will ever feel comfortable with fat.

"They tell me that I'm female, and I'm supposed to have a little fat on me, but I don't like it," she said.

"It's my body, and if I don't want to have fat, I don't have to."

Support group formed

Students to promote McCain entertainment

By Lori Stauffer
Collegian Reporter

Although student attendance to the McCain series productions has been average, the McCain Development Board would like to see it increase, said John Riley, chairman of the board's Student Audience Committee.

"Some students think if they go see an opera they should forget about basketball. That's not necessarily so," Riley said. "They owe it to themselves to get a taste of other forms of talent."

To encourage student involvement with the McCain series, the board formed the Student Audience Committee. Twenty students interested in the series are recommended to the board and then elected to a position on the committee. Their job is to promote the McCain program to the student community, Riley said.

Previously, the committee has posted information, worked at tables in the Union and presented programs to campus living groups to promote student awareness of the upcoming productions.

Most recently, to promote the Feb. 11 production of "Big River," the committee sponsored a scene meal at the residence halls that represented the Huckleberry Finn era.

Also, the board played host to a student reception for the Kronos Quartet after the concert Friday, to which student season ticket holders were invited.

Riley said the Student Audience Committee, in conjunction with the Student Development Council, is attempting to organize a dinner theater couple package, but nothing is definite yet.

Riley and McCain Director Richard Martin are hoping that with the Board of Regents' approval of the fine arts/athletic fee, McCain will be able to offer reduced ticket prices that will entice more students.

Student ticket prices are about one-third the general public price, and Martin said he is planning to cut student prices to about one-half the cost of the general public ticket.

However, state budget cuts may put a tight squeeze on the performance series next year. Lowering ticket prices while taking a hit from state reductions may seem a little self-defeating, especially when ticket sales must generate 90 percent of the money that will cover the cost of performances.

But Martin said he still may be able to make the arts more available to the student because the fine arts/athletic fee accounts for the slack caused by the cut in ticket prices.

"Kansas does not put a lot of money into the arts," Martin said. "But one tries to do the best one can with limited resources."

He said ticket prices are not the sole factor affecting student attendance at McCain performances. For example, Motley Crue concert tickets are selling for $18.50, but none of the McCain prices are above this price. Martin said he expects student attendance at the concert to be a high.

The entertainment value and student interest that accompanies the Crue concert is what the series must give to the students in order to raise attendance, Martin said.

For example, for the National Theatre of the Deaf's production of "The Odyssey," 62 percent of the ticket sales were for student and children's tickets. Martin attributed the high student attendance to the freshness of the actors and its appeal to students.

Martin said he wants this interest and curiosity to grow and continue into next year, when he hopes McCain will be able to offer a play spoken entirely in Spanish.

"I want people to gamble. I want people to be willing to take a chance," he said. "What we're doing is risky. We're trying to do things that are educational."

But, Martin said he's trying to keep the risks manageable.

Martin would also like to see McCain continue its part in education by sponsoring artists-in-residence.

"We'd like to keep the artists here longer than just for the performance," he said. "If the performers are here a half day longer, other students, not just confined to the arts, might get the opportunity to learn from them."

Martin would like to see McCain bring in a troupe of five actors from Great Britain as a part of the artist-in-residence program. The actors would teach classes throughout a week with two performances at the conclusion.

The fees paid for the regular performances do not include the extra time the artist would spend on campus, however. This often ties the hands of the McCain director and the McCain Development Board financially.

The cost of quality, recognized performers has gone up in the past five years, McCain Development Board President Don Wissman said.

"A top violinist can cost $45,000 for one night. We need a lot of participation on the local level to be able to continue bringing in the good quality performers," Wissman said.

Forensic team competes despite money problems

By Heather Stewart
Collegian Reporter

A group of K-State students gives more than lip service to competition.

Speech Unlimited, the K-State forensics team, competes in about 14 tournaments a year, said Craig Brown, instructor of speech and team director.

"During the week of preparation, we prepare three events for the tournament," said Jana Denning, freshman in pre-law and political science. "One event is interpretation, and the other is public speaking. The third event is one of the two."

Some of the speech topics for the interpretation event include killer bees, ergonomics, repetitive strain injury and Father Jean Bertrand Aristade.

The public speaking topics are taken from areas such as prose, poetry and plays, Brown said.

"During the competition, the judges are usually very fair and keep their own biases out of their decisions," Brown said.

A duo from the team is performing speeches on both sides of the abortion issue. The speakers are giving each side equal time.

"The funny thing is that we thought we were being completely fair and trying not to get anyone mad," Brown said. "When they gave it, both sides of the debate got mad. This was totally unexpected."

Speech Unlimited competes mainly with Hastings (Neb.) College, the University of Nebraska at Lincoln and Southwest Baptist in Bolivar, Mo., at the tournaments.

"Squads from some schools get to compete in bigger tournaments because of their funds," said David Carson, sophomore in speech. "We are only able to participate in tournaments close to K-State — Nebraska, Missouri and Oklahoma — since our funding is low."

Carson said the Speech Unlimited team does not attend the big tournaments due to lack of funds and scholarships awarded.

The College of Arts and Science

Council provides 75-80 percent of the team's funds, Brown said. The speech department pays for the transportation, which consists of University vans or the members' own cars. Meals are paid for by the team members themselves.

"We start to find it hard to motivate ourselves when there are no scholarships or money for scholarships available to help us," Carson said. Because the team is participating in tournaments that are no longer stimulating, it is hard to push to get better, he said.

Even though the finance problem is putting a strain on the forensics team members, their spirits are not dimmed.

"Forensics is a good experience for people in any major," Denning said. "It enables people to develop good speaking skills as well as making close friends and traveling."

The forensics team is open to any undergraduate who wants to join.

University's past to be on display

By Lori Stauffer
Collegian Reporter

An exhibit featuring K-State memorabilia will be set up at the Riley County Historical Museum this month, said Jeanne Mithen, museum librarian.

A portrait of former K-State president Milton Eisenhower, brother of former U.S. president Dwight D. Eisenhower, will be featured in the exhibit.

Eisenhower was the first native Kansan and the first alumnus of K-State to be appointed president of the University. He majored in journalism and graduated with the class of 1924, according to James C. Carey, author of "Kansas State University: The Quest for Identity."

Carey also wrote that Eisenhower, upon returning to K-State as president in 1943, found himself the administrator over many faculty members who had once been his professors.

The museum was given several autographed copies of Eisenhower biographies belonging to Harry Wareham. Wareham was a prominent Manhattan businessman and a friend of Eisenhower.

Also included in the collection are old photographs and Royal Purple yearbooks. Mithen said before 1891, yearbook pictures were the only true record of students and instructors.

"They used to line up the faculty and snap their pictures. They (the photos) have given us a good general history and record of the alumni," Mithen said.

The pictorial history is supplemented by memorabilia contributed by alumni. She said the collection includes programs and catalogs dating back to the nineteenth century.

Mithen said paper artifacts are not something the museum has set out to collect. Alumni who have lived in the community bring in old papers and yearbooks and thus have built up the museum's supply.

Although there has not been a permanent exhibit about K-State or Eisenhower in the museum, several of the current exhibits involve people and places connected with the University. For example, an exhibit on the streetcars that used to run through Manhattan and to the University includes a picture of the K-State baseball team in the early 1900s.

"K-State appears in some exhibits. Many relate to Kansas State or K-State grads," Mithen said.

Barbara Poresky, exhibit designer, said the museum had small or temporary exhibits about the University, but a permanent display is under consideration.

"We are redesigning our exhibits and are talking about setting up a display on K-State, maybe in the corner," Mithen said.

The exhibit, she said, would emphasize the University's effect on the Manhattan community and Riley County.

"Early settlers were interested in starting a college," Mithen said. "In 1860 Bluemont College was formed, and in 1863 a land grant was given and it became K-State."

occupying a separate area, known as homelands, with its own leadership and educational system," he said.

The curriculum for each homeland is set by the government, not by the educators, and each curriculum differs from the other in what the children are required to learn, Ramathoka said.

"Ideally, there would be one educational system in which we can play an active part in deciding the curriculum," he said.

Fullagar said de Klerk's decision was triggered in part by internal pressure placed on the government by various groups through labor movements, strikes and similar measures. External pressure from other countries, through such actions as divestments, sports boycotts and other political sanctions contributed to the decision as well, he said.

"South Africa was excluded from the international community. This really hurt its economy badly," Fullagar said. "The internal and external pressures pushed the nationalist party into realizing that South Africa's future lies in negotiating with the black majority."

However, de Klerk's announcement was unexpected.

"I think it caught the ANC off-guard. They had a well-formulated response only a few days later," Fullagar said.

Although Fullagar called de Klerk's action the most momentous act any white politician ever made in South Africa, he said he believes it is only a first step and a large amount of work has yet to be done.

"The conflict primarily evolves around the government trying to protect the rights of minority groups — especially the white — and the ANC pushing for a government by the majority, one person, one vote," he said. Fullagar said the aim of the ANC is a non-racist society.

"They never said they would exclude the whites," he said. "It is my personal view that the only way to protect group rights is to value the individual rights of every person. Then the rights of the minority are automatically protected."

Fullagar said it is too early for the international community to lift all sanctions from South Africa immediately.

"It would be foolish to lift all sanctions at this point. They are an extremely effective pressure which should continue to be applied until apartheid is demolished," he said.

Both Ramathoka and Fullagar said changes in the social and political structure of South Africa will be gradual.

"If segregation is abolished, new circumstances will evolve which will change people's attitudes," Fullagar said.

"The civil rights movement in the United States happened approximately 20 to 30 years ago. If South Africa will be at the level of the U.S. 30 years from now, despite the discrimination which is still going on here, it would be a great progress."

discussion will take place. We will then set the date to present the draft," said Stormy Kennedy, a committee member.

The second draft adds two new points to the original draft. The first point gives tenants the opportunity to break their lease within 30 days if their rental unit is not properly licensed. The second point adds a license denial or revocation appeals process.

"We have never had a (rental inspection) program before," said Chuck Williams, assistant director of engineering for Manhattan. "There is just a concern that some of our housing doesn't meet requirements."

Williams said the program will affect not only K-State students living off-campus, but anyone renting living space in Manhattan. The program was not created because of any particular incident, but rather an overall concern for housing.

The rental agreement may draw a strong opposition at the meeting, said Wade Whitmer, director of the Consumer Relations Board on campus. Opposition may be voiced by a group of Manhattan landlords who met in the Manhattan Public Library Feb. 1 to discuss how the new rental inspection program would affect them.

None of the landlords who were contacted would comment on their position concerning the program.

homes, he said.

Ulrich said the potential load on electric power available will also be a concern to utility companies.

Johannes said while the idea of an electric vehicle is not new, GM's work is an important development. "What makes it significant is that it's the first time one of the Big Three (car manufacturers) has gotten involved," he said.

Art McKenna, sales manager for Jim Clark Auto Center, said GM's electric vehicles are still strictly in the testing stage and have not been released to dealers.

biomedical research sector (in the United States)," he said.

Whitehair, who is a 1953 graduate of the University, said NIH has not imported any chimpanzees since 1976, which is significant because NIH has traditionally sponsored about 80 percent of the biomedical research in the United States.

"Even though chimpanzees weren't classified as an endangered species at that time (1976), we've treated them as though they have been," he said.

Researchers value chimpanzees largely because of the many biological and behavioral similarities they share with humans, Whitehair said.

"We feel the chimpanzee is about as close as you can get to man as far as anatomical and behavioral similarities are concerned," he said.

As an example of the progress made by AIDS researchers using chimpanzees as lab animals, Whitehair said NIH researchers recently learned that when the Human Immunodeficiency Virus is injected into a chimp, the animal will become infected, but it will not become symptomatic or develop AIDS.

The benefits chimpanzees offer to AIDS researchers are among the many reasons why it is vital to preserve the species, Whitehair said.

"(Commercial usage) is probably a year to two years down the road due to the mechanics of it," McKenna said. "I think it's good to say we're looking at alternative fuel sources, but nothing is near."

Curt Domino, sales manager for Elkins Motor Co. Inc., said General Motors is also testing a solar-powered vehicle. McKenna said it is similar to the electric vehicle, except for the use of solar energy for recharging the batteries instead of commercial electricity.

"But if the sun doesn't come out you've got no power," McKenna said.

Ulrich said KPL has worked with the College of Engineering in the past.

other was the Mentor program.

Jorns explained that the Mentor system assigned at-risk students to teachers who encouraged them and monitored their progress. She said the teachers also act as friends to the children.

Tedrow talked about her experiences while eating in the school lunchroom with some of her students and encouraged the audience of perspective teachers to do the same.

If students frequently miss class or consistently do poorly on exams, many times they are dealt with only academically and their problems go unrecognized.

"One of the most serious problems I deal with is the effect that some kind of abusive situation had on them 10 years ago, and they're still trying to work it out and deal with it," Newton said.

To become a member of Phi Beta Kappa, a student must have a 3.75 GPA in his or her junior year or a 3.5 GPA in the senior year. The student is selected and reviewed by the review committee on the basis of scholastic records.

"Students usually get into Phi Beta Kappa during their last semester," Kruh said. "There are about 25 new members elected each year."

After students are elected, they go through an initiation dealing with the history of Phi Beta Kappa.

"The student also benefits from Phi Beta Kappa," Kruh said. "Being a member of Phi Beta Kappa can help you get into a professional school such as medical school or law school."

"Phi Beta Kappa enables the student to be recognized for cultivating intellectual achievement in liberal learning," Kruh said.

correct.

One particularly evocative piece in the exhibition is the aptly named "Moving Through," 1989. This oil-on-canvas work may be a "snapshot" of a person's transitional stage. In subdued colors, a figure appears fearful, frozen — locked in a particular stage of growth. Behind the figure, a shadowy soul seems to escape this stagnation.

Another aptly named piece is "Second Skin," 1982, a striking work of oil and emulsion on canvas.

The painting depicts two figures that face one another — one of a woman, the other barely distinguishable. The ghostly, incomplete images force the viewer to fill in the missing pieces of this moment in time.

"The Phoenix Rises," 1989, marks a thematic departure from the other works in the exhibition, as there are no human figures in the piece. Depicted instead is an angular, black splash of bird rising from a blood-red, flaming pool into a turquoise sky.

Rounding out the show is "Kansas Strata Revisited," 1982, a three-element, oil-on-canvas-on-masonite piece. Each element contrasts a dreamlike, otherworldly female figure with the solid permanence of rock — perhaps symbolizing the duality of the woman's experience.

The exhibition is highly recommended viewing. For more information, contact the Union Program Council Arts Committee at 532-6571.

are willing to learn and see what the rest of the world is like.

For three days, Gorbachev's draft platform was strongly criticized from both the right wing and the left wing at the Kremlin meetings. Some of these speeches were released by Tass, and participants also describe the struggles in interviews with western reporters.

Tass and Radio Moscow reported the approval of the platform but did not provide immediate details. They said the document would be published in official newspapers later.

Despite the heated debate, there were few major changes in the document Gorbachev presented, Fyodorov said.

Radio Moscow said the Central Committee also agreed to advance the date of the next party Congress from October to no later than July. The Congress, the most powerful party body, is the only group empowered to choose a new Central Committee.

The Central Committee is considered by reformers to be the bastion of conservatives wary of Gorbachev's reform program. The Congress would offer Gorbachev another chance to reform the committee to his liking.

Sources inside the Central Committee meeting said it would recommend to the Supreme Soviet parliament that it delete Article 6 of the constitution in the first step of a two-stage government process.

Joseph Hajda, professor of political science, said the proposal will be difficult to pass because of the division of opinion among the top leaders on the details of the proposal. He said it still has to go through the Congress of Peoples Deputies, where a strong fraction of staunch conservatives exists.

The Supreme Soviet could take up the issue at its next session beginning Feb. 14.

"So really, they just postponed the decision," Hajda said. "When we see what the real specifics of the proposal will be, then we will see if they have a real multiparty government."

"If the proposal passes, it will mean to the people that hopefully they will enjoy the fruits of a political democracy. The United States likes the idea that they are promoting the idea of self-government and promote policies that emphasize that idea."

parking lots."

He said it was last used during the past summer.

"During the winter months, it's not practical to use, because the batteries discharge quickly under cold conditions," Beckom said.

The car is convenient to use, he said, adding he would go back to using it if the charging problems could be solved.

Three-wheeled scooters are used where the car would be, Beckom said. Their fuel costs are about the same as the cost of recharging the car.

Although "not a real barn burner," it will travel about 25 to 30 mph, he said.

Beckom doesn't anticipate the car will be used much more in the future because he said he has not had time to spend on the car, and no one outside his department has been found to work on it.

"Right now, we're trying to get back to some people who can solve the charging problem," he said.

Buildings missing safety devices

By Jan Puls
Collegian Reporter

More than one-fourth of the buildings on campus have no smoke detectors, fire alarms or alarm pull stations.

Of the 71 campus buildings, 19 do not have these devices. The remainder of the buildings have some combination of this equipment, but may lack items such as lighted exit signs or emergency lights, said Larry Garvin, director of facilities planning.

"These buildings aren't required by law to have these devices if they were built before these stipulations were enacted under the national building code," Garvin said.

Under this grandfather clause, as long as the buildings aren't touched, nothing has to be done to them, Garvin said.

Only three buildings have annunciator boards, which register the fire alarm and location of the fire within the building to the police.

"We have a total of $13 million worth of special maintenance that needs to be done," Garvin said.

Updating fire protection and life safety devices ranks second on K-State's building priority list, according to the Proposed Long Range Building Request published Aug. 1, 1989.

It will cost $517,500 over the next four fiscal years to improve "significant existing risks" and bring buildings up to current standards for fire and life safety, according to the University's 1989 Capital Improvements Request.

According to the request, $143,400 will be allocated for fiscal year 1991 to install fire and safety equipment in areas "deemed most hazardous."

Fire alarms will be installed in Call Hall, Denison Hall and Willard Hall. Lighted exit

Petty thefts cost students $102,000

By Joann Beckman
Staff Reporter

More than $102,000 worth of property was reported stolen to the campus police in 1989, said Charles Beckom, chief of K-State police.

University detective Richard Herman said petty theft is the theft of any item worth less than $500 and is a misdemeanor. Felony theft is the theft of any item worth more than $500.

"Misdemeanor theft is not on the rise because there are more thefts," Herman said. "It's on the rise because of that $500 limit. It used to be $150, and then it went to $300. Now it's $500. So the number of thefts hasn't gone up so much, I think, as it has been reclassified because of the dollar amount."

"Most of our petty theft occurs in automobile burglaries, such as some of your cheaper stereos and speakers, loose items in the vehicles."

Petty theft of items such as video cassette recorders, cameras, loose money and books occurs in residence halls, Herman said.

Dave Haden, director of Haymaker Hall, said more thefts occur during book buyback time and at the beginning of the semester when students have not learned to lock their doors yet.

Erin Murphy, director of Boyd Hall, said some thefts occur in the residence halls when people leave their rooms unlocked when they go to the bathroom or visit a friend's room.

"An open door is a good opportunity to check things out and take little things," she said.

Jack Watson, assistant director of facilities maintenance, said items such as thermostats and door closures sent out for large maintenance jobs are sometimes stolen. But he said there does not appear to be an increase in thefts of facilities property.

"It runs about the same, year in and year out," he said.

Items such as eating utensils, glasses, salt and pepper shakers and plates are stolen from food service, Murphy said.

"Sometimes people take stuff out of food service because they feel like they can use it in their rooms," she said. "They have every intention of returning it."

Murphy said many residence halls put boxes on each floor at the end of the year

Rent meeting turns angry

Owners argue proposed ordinance clashes with Landlord Tenant Act

By Steve Franzen
Staff Reporter

What had been termed a work session for a citizen's committee to discuss a rental inspection program turned into a crowded argument between the committee and angry Manhattan landlords.

More than 60 people attended the meeting in the City Commission Room at City Hall, which overflowed into two adjacent hallways.

The committee was to discuss revisions to the second draft of a rental inspection program ordinance for Manhattan.

The purpose of the program is to obtain an organized set of rules to ensure safe and fair-priced housing, Thomas Frith, a committee member and former director of K-State's housing department, said in an Collegian article Thursday.

Fifteen minutes into the meeting, the landlords stopped the meeting, demanding that more space be made available in the room.

Mike Conduff, city manager, tried to maintain order in the meeting, but his attempts to follow the agenda were often interrupted by outbursts from the audience.

One of the main reasons for the disorganization was because the landlords believed they had been misinformed as to the nature of the meeting. They said they were led to believe the meeting was solely for landlords to express their grievances.

The landlords argued the citizen's committee should not be allowed to review the proposed revisions at this meeting, which they did for 20 minutes. Conduff limited the meeting to two hours.

"The purpose of the meeting is to take comments heard today and make a final draft," Conduff said.

One of the landlords' concerns was the conflict the proposed ordinance had with the Landlord Tenant Act. The act is the document governing the relationship between landlords and their tenants.

"I feel that there are many items in this ordinance that are definitely in conflict with the Landlord Tenant Act," said Richard Hill, committee member.

The landlords' comments were opened by Ruth Schrum, unofficial head of the group, when she read a prepared statement.

"The consensus of the group (landlords) is to cancel or drop the ordinance and disband the citizen's committee," Schrum said. "I submit that this ordinance has already cost us. It can cause the students to rethink if they want to come here."

Several landlords spoke against the proposed ordinance, but one spoke in favor of it.

"We complied with all the codes and zon-

Progressives: Control of KGB, military must end in U.S.S.R.

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Communist maverick Boris N. Yeltsin and progressive activists said Thursday the party's decision to renounce its legal claim on power is not enough to end Soviet political repression and centralized control.

"It is necessary to eliminate (Communist) party organizations in the army, the police, the KGB, the courts, in all the state institutions," said Yuri Mityunov, a spokesman for one would-be opposition party, the Democratic Union.

Yeltsin was the sole member of the party's policy-making Central Committee to oppose the political reforms Wednesday. He said they failed to go far enough.

"I had grounds to vote against. But I think, however, that the platform represents if not a step then a half-step forward, and that lessens the tension before the (party) Congress," he said in an interview in his office near the Kremlin.

He recommended the formation of a second party if the Communist Party fails to excise conservatives at the Congress to be held in early summer.

Yeltsin was a keynote speaker at the largest pro-democracy rally in decades at the foot of Red Square last Sunday. Several hundred thousand people rallied and demanded the party abandon its guaranteed leading role in Soviet society.

At the Central Committee meeting that ended Wednesday, the party did just that, approving President Mikhail S. Gorbachev's party platform that calls for revoking the party's constitutional guarantee in favor of a multiparty system where Communists would have to compete for power.

"The discussion was very hot. The proposals were diametrically opposed. It was not easy," Yeltsin said, gesturing expansively before departing to take the political temperature among activists in Leningrad.

Mityunov said pressure for reform is now moving to the streets and pointed to the growing number of incidents of angry crowds across the Soviet Union demanding the ouster of hard-line local Communist leaders.

Party secretaries in Volgograd, Tyumen, Chernigov and Sverdlovsk were removed in recent weeks, and activists said 6,000 people gathered in front of the party headquarters in Donetsk on Wednesday with a similar demand.

Reformers in Saratov plan to rally Sunday to demand removal of their party leaders.

The main television news program Vremya showed another rally in Donetsk on Thursday with people demanding the resignation of Politburo member Yegor K. Ligachev, a leading conservative. The TV commentator said the majority of people at the rally supported Gorbachev.

Yeltsin said the party must reform itself, but the current strength of conservatives in the Central Committee, to which he belongs, complicates the task.

He declined to say what percent of the vote he thought the Communist Party would win if there were free elections now.

"The transition to a multiparty system is just a question of time," he said. "It is inevitable and necessary. We should use all chances still to renew the party so that it will have a democratic basis. We should try this chance."

The party Congress will vote on the party platform and has the power to change the Central Committee.

Yeltsin said the platform, which has yet to be made available to the public, contained outdated language and failed to endorse radical measures he said are needed to undo the economic chaos created by seven decades of central planning.

"You talk about approving this program, how can I do it?" Yeltsin asked. He said the draft still endorses "democratic centralism," the principle used to justify central planning.

Yeltsin said the Central Committee rejected his proposal for eliminating the bureaucracy as an instrument of power in favor of self-management in enterprises and said he believed that a market-style economy was desirable as long as workers were protected in the transition.

Teen-ager pleads guilty

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A 16-year-old boy pleaded guilty in juvenile court Wednesday to first-degree felony murder and attempted aggravated robbery in the death last week of businessman Paul S. Bramlage.

Anthony E. Clark will be sentenced Feb. 20 by Shawnee County Juvenile Judge Daniel Mitchell.

The maximum penalty is commitment to a state youth center, with a recommendation that he remain in custody until he is 21. Under state law, he could be kept no longer than that.

Two other juveniles, one 14 and the other 15, were also charged in the Bramlage killing. Jean Schmidt, an assistant district attorney, said that the case of one of the two was also resolved Wednesday, but that because of the child's age she could release no further information. She said that the other child's case is still scheduled for trial.

A 17-year-old was also arrested after Bramlage, 37, was slain early Jan. 30 outside the Monarch Apartments, of which he was part-owner. That youth has not been charged in the homicide, although Schmidt said it was still technically under consideration. The youth was charged with an unrelated robbery that took place after Bramlage was killed.

Schmidt said that for various factors which she didn't want to specify, it was decided not to try Clark as an adult. But since he is 16, his juvenile hearing was open.

In laying a foundation for the charges, the prosecutor said Clark and three other juveniles, armed with a rifle, revolver and sawed-off shotgun, went to the apartment complex planning to fight another group.

But she said that when there was no sign of the other youths, they decided to rob someone, and Bramlage drove up. She said the 14-year-old and 15-year-old held guns to Bramlage and demanded money. When he refused, one of them shot him and started to flee, and the other shot him as he ran off.

The prosecutor said the group split up, but Clark and one of the younger boys returned to get help for Bramlage, and Clark was there when police arrived.

Police use tear gas, clubs

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — Police used tear gas and clubs Thursday to disperse hundreds of blacks protesting a tour by an English cricket team that defied an anti-apartheid boycott.

A Cabinet minister said continuing unrest is prolonging South Africa's state of emergency and said threats against Nelson Mandela from left- and right-wing extremists are among the factors delaying the ANC leader's release from prison.

"We want to ensure he walks out of that prison a free man and lives safely in this country as a free citizen," Law and Order Minister Adriaan Vlok told a news conference in Cape Town.

In the township of Alexandra, police arrested at least six blacks, saying they had commandeered minibuses to transport protesters to the nearby cricket grounds despite a magistrate's ban on demonstrations.

Police stopped all minibus taxis and most cars leaving the township, removing any youths they found on their way to the five-day test match between the English visitors and South Africa's national team.

A crowd of 2,000 people, mostly students, then assembled at an intersection and were "dispersed peacefully" after tear gas was used, police said. A local anti-apartheid group, the Alexandra Civic Organization, claimed some would-be protesters were beaten and that 30 were injured.

Ex-mayor of Moscow dies

MADRID, Spain (AP) — Yuri A. Belyakov, the first deputy mayor of Moscow, died Wednesday of a heart attack during a visit to Madrid. Neither his age nor any other biographical information was disclosed.

He was the No. 2 official in the Moscow city administration. On Monday, Belyakov joined Madrid Mayor Agustin Rodriguez Sahagun to inaugurate the "Moscow in Madrid Week" of cultural activities, including dance, theater and concert performances by Soviet groups.

Tests may be inadmissible

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) — The prosecution in Joseph Hazelwood's trial tried Thursday to bar from evidence the results of blood tests on two Coast Guardsmen who tested positive for alcohol and marijuana after the nation's worst oil spill.

The former Exxon Valdez skipper's attorneys want the evidence admitted because the two men were assigned to a radar monitoring station that was supposed to track the ship's movements and notify it if any problems appeared imminent.

Hazelwood, 43, of Huntington, N.Y., is being tried on a felony charge of second-degree criminal mischief and misdemeanor charges of reckless endangerment, negligent discharge of oil and operating a vessel while intoxicated. If convicted, he faces up to seven years and three months in prison and $61,000 in fines.

Assistant District Attorney Brent Cole argued the tests were irrelevant to the case against Hazelwood because the Coast Guard is not being accused of negligence in the trial.

"This is not a civil negligence case," Cole told Superior Court Judge Karl Johnstone. "We have an attempt by the defense to turn it into (that) by trying to spread out the blame."

Hazelwood's attorney, Dick Madson, insisted it is critical to know whether the Coast Guardsmen were watching the radar when the defense addresses the question of Hazelwood's culpability in the accident.

'Fatal attraction' charged

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. (AP) — To most, Carolyn Warmus is a bright, energetic schoolteacher. To police, she is an obsessed woman who pumped nine shots into her lover's wife, then met the man for drinks and sex.

It took a year of intense legwork by two detectives to put together the case that made a murder suspect out of the 26-year-old computer science teacher and insurance heiress.

Warmus was charged with second-degree murder Monday. Police said she shot Betty Jeanne Solomon, 40, nine times on Jan. 15, 1989, then drove to a local hotel to meet her lover, fellow schoolteacher Paul Solomon, for drinks and a sexual tryst in her car.

Her attorney, Charles Fiore, maintains his client is innocent. He said Thursday she passed a polygraph test administered by her family attorney five days after the slaying.

Warmus was not the initial suspect in the killing. Solomon was.

Defense rests in oilman trial

TOPEKA (AP) — The defense rested its case Thursday in the fraud trial of Wichita oilman James W. Hershberger, without calling Hershberger himself to testify in his own behalf.

Friday, the prosecution is scheduled to call six witnesses to rebut the testimony of defense witnesses, especially that of Sally Hershberger, the defendant's wife.

Hershberger is charged with 37 counts of fraud in connection with operation of his now-defunct company, Petroleum Energy Inc. The trial began Jan. 8.

Among those who will be called are former Hershberger employee Kathy Epperly, former Hershberger business associate Glenn Vess and two men who bought Hershberger's company, Matt and James Mattingly.

Judge Dale E. Saffels, who is presiding over the case in U.S. District Court, told jury members that they could receive the case for deliberation later Friday and told attorneys he hoped they could finish their rebuttals Friday and begin closing arguments.

However, prosecution attorney Richard Hathaway told the judge that Vess was not available until Monday so he couldn't complete the case until then. Defense attorney Thomas Haney also told the judge he didn't think he could be ready for closing arguments until Monday because he was not feeling well.

Worker charged with rape

INDEPENDENCE (AP) — The house manager at a center for the developmentally disabled was charged Thursday with rape and aggravated sexual battery stemming from incidents involving two residents of the center, police said.

Ron McClelland, 31, of rural Coffeyville, was charged in Montgomery County District Court with one count of rape and two counts of aggravated sexual battery, Independence police Detective David Higday said.

The two women are residents of the Class Limited Residence Center, authorities said. McClelland had been house manager of the center for less than one year.

Montgomery County Attorney Terry Todd said McClelland appeared before District Judge David Thompson and was released on bond. The case has been under investigation for several months. Higday said the incidents appear to be isolated.

"There is no indication this has been an ongoing problem," he said. "There was one reported incident per victim."

Bob Clark, president of Class Limited, headquartered in Columbus, said McClelland had been suspended pending resolution of the case.

Company replaces wells at dam

Brad Camp/Staff

Officials look over one of 41 pressure relief wells being dug on the east side of Tuttle Creek Dam Wednesday. New relief wells are being installed due to the deterioration of the old wooden wells.

By Gregory A. Branson
Collegian Reporter

Forty-one pressure relief wells are being replaced under Tuttle Creek Dam because the wood used to brace the wells is deteriorating.

The project will take about 56 days to complete with the drilling crew working 24-hour days. It will cost $480,273, said Bill Lowe, Army Corps of Engineer's geologist.

Lowe said when the lake was built, the wells were constructed out of wooden pipe and wooden well-screens. The wood is getting old and starting to deteriorate, creating problems when the wells are serviced.

The wells relieve pressure from the dam, caused by the natural tendency of water to level itself out. The dam is built on 40 to 60 inches of sand. Water from the reservoir seeps through the sand and tries to rise to the same level as the reservoir on the other side of the dam.

"The wells let us control the water rising to the surface," Lowe said. "They provide holes where the pressure can be relieved, instead of the pressure creating holes in the softest place they can find."

The water from the wells spills into a drainage ditch that empties into the pond below the dam.

Dale Forge, project manager of Tuttle Creek Reservoir, said 43 wells stretch about a mile and a half across the river bed, directly below the dam.

The new wells are being dug by Russell Drilling Company Inc., from Bismark, N.D., using direct-rotary drilling. This is the same type of drilling used to drill home wells, but on a larger scale, Lowe said.

The deepest well will go to the bedrock, 84 feet beneath the surface, and the shallowest will be about 45 feet deep. The pipe will be eight inches in diameter when it reaches the surface.

The older wells will still be functional after the new ones are installed.

"In essence, we'll put a small diameter well made out of plastic pipe inside the wooden ones," Lowe said. "But we won't maintain the wooden wells, and eventually they will plug up."

The wells at Milford Reservoir, which are wooden also, are in the process of being replaced.

"In the Kansas City District, Tuttle Creek, Milford, Wilson, and Rathbun Reservoir in Iowa all have wooden wells," Lowe said. "There are other districts within the Corp of Engineers that also have these kinds of wells."

There is no immediate danger to the dam, but replacing the wells now will prevent problems.

Problems occur when silt builds up inside the wells and plugs them up. The wells are cleaned every three years to remove the silt.

"Because of the deteriorating wood in the wells, we can't clean them because they will break," Lowe said.

Favorable winds help clean-up

By The Associated Press

HUNTINGTON BEACH, Calif. — A drifting oil slick threatened miles of beaches and estuaries Thursday after a tanker apparently was punctured by an anchor and spilled 295,000 gallons of Alaskan crude oil.

Favorable offshore wind held the slick out to sea off this popular Southern California recreational area until afternoon. But the wind then reversed direction and threatened to nudge the goo toward shore.

Oil was spotted as close as a quarter-mile offshore but the bulk was at least 3 miles out to sea.

Calm seas eased clean-up efforts.

"If the weather holds we have a good probability of getting most of the oil," Coast Guard Rear Adm. William Kime told a press conference after an inspection flight.

"Every indication is the vessel is no longer leaking oil," Kime said.

The 811-foot tanker American Trader, which had been fully loaded with 21 million gallons, lay off the coast surrounded by a floating oil containment boom and Coast Guard vessels.

Coast Guard Commandant Adm. Paul Yost said the ship's hull apparently was punctured when it hit something on the bottom as the crew prepared to hook up to an underwater pipeline that carries crude oil to shore. It was unclear if the tanker hit one of its own anchors or a buoy anchor, he said.

The purple slick covered an area measuring 2½ miles by 4 miles, said Coast Guard Lt. Vincent Campos. Five skimmer boats were at work and four more were en route to the area, off the Orange County coastline about 35 miles southeast of Los Angeles.

Several hundred people watched from shore as the sun set behind Santa Catalina Island but there were still no signs of oil on the beach before dark.

Pro-choice group planned for campus

Coalition searches for interested students to help form abortion rights organization

By Heather Anderson
Collegian Reporter

The Manhattan chapter of the Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights is in the early planning stages of organizing such a group on campus, said Jan Galitzer, RCAR president.

The Manhattan chapter of the pro-choice lobby group was formed in July 1989 in response to the July 3, 1989 Supreme Court decision that gave more power to the states over abortion laws.

The local group is affiliated with the Kansas RCAR and the national RCAR, which was formed in 1973 after the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision.

"Locally, we started in response to the Supreme Court decision this past year, as well as in response to our local representatives to the legislature," Galitzer said.

"We were concerned that the choice point of view is represented locally," she said.

To start a campus chapter, Manhattan RCAR is looking for students who are interested in organizing such a group, Galitzer said.

"We think there are a lot of people that would be interested in this sort of thing," she said.

Only three or four local chapters exist in Kansas. Interest in local chapters, however, has increased since this summer.

Galitzer said although the group faces opposition from pro-life church groups, they are also supported by many organizational congregations.

"In the organized churches, as opposed to the individual fundamentalist churches, we have many choice proponents who are quite willing to stand up and be public," she said.

However, Galitzer said, none of the local churches as a whole have taken a stand with the group because they believe the abortion issue is too political.

Galitzer said while religiously affiliated pro-life and pro-choice groups exist, significant differences are evident between the two.

"Those of us who are pro-choice are willing to stick our necks out to support whichever viewpoint an individual takes. That, we believe, is the significant difference between pro-choice and anti-choice groups," she said.

"Anti-choice groups think that everyone else should believe the way they do. By making legislation based on that belief, you are basically legislating a particular religious point of view, and that is in opposition to the Constitution of the United States."

Galitzer said RCAR is directing its energies toward the current Kansas legislative session and the issue of parental consent for abortion.

There is no state law requiring minors to obtain parental consent before having an abortion, Galitzer said.

"There are several options that are still in committee, but the one that's coming up on the floor soon will require not just parental consent, but that any girl under 16 must have both parents notified," Galitzer said.

Problems will arise, she said, when a girl's parents are divorced or separated, and both parents can't be reached.

Galitzer said she believes abortion will remain legal in Kansas.

"Even in a state that is known to be as conservative as Kansas, the majority of the population is pro-choice," she said.

Moderation is best used in moderation

A very wise man with long hair once told me there was nothing in the middle of the road but yellow stripes and dead animals.

He had a good point and I might be inclined to agree with him, but I'm not sure if it would be prudent to do so at this juncture. As a proud and practicing moderate, I certainly wouldn't want to jump to any conclusions.

Ahhh... moderation. To me, the very word is as cool and enticing as an Eskimo Pie in Hades.

I first became a moderate along about the third grade when I became entangled in a dispute between two fifth graders. One of them thought I was a dink and that I should be given a wedgie until my underwear came up over my head. The other thought I was a dork and that I should have my head dunked in a toilet and given a swirl. They both had good points.

However, I was able to convince them, through moderation, that there was another student in my class who was both a dink and a dork and thus worthy of both rewards. They thanked me, and my long career as a moderate had begun.

I have since avoided conflict at nearly all costs. I avoid dating, because with dates come relationships and with relationships come spats and with spats come conflict. (When the occasional date or relationship does come along, I try to make sure it is with someone who can dominate me. It seems to alleviate a lot of tension.)

I avoid politics. I vote, but I try not to get political about it.

I also avoid having political discussions. I've tried having them before, but my opinions always seem to annoy people. Opinions can be so annoying.

Of course, it would follow that I try not to discuss such issues as the homeless, abortion, drug problems, China, K-State athletics and Gov. Mike Hayden. If I talk about them I might accidentally let an opinion slip out, and then all heck might break loose.

I have, in essence, lived my life in as moderate a fashion as possible without actually sleeping all day. I eat, sleep, drink and think moderation. I am a moderate's moderate.

There is one source of constant annoyance in being such a staunch moderate, however: loneliness.

Besides the Methodist church, moderates have few places to turn to for kinship and comradeship. We are many, but because most organizations require their members to think in one fashion or another, we have no place to just hang out together and be... well, moderate.

Richard Broadfoot

I wouldn't want to commit to anything as yet, but wouldn't it be nice if there were such a place right here at K-State? We could call ourselves Students for Militant Compromise or something of the sort.

We could have nice, cute T-shirts that said things like "Arbitrate or Die!" or "Tread Lightly on Me, Please." We wouldn't have any president or treasurer, and no dues would be collected because money is the root of all conflict (i.e. evil). We'd just stand around and tell each other how nice we looked and how nice it would be if we could do this more often.

Who knows, if we got enough members we might even go about solving these so-called problems that K-State is having.

Our football woes could easily be solved by putting less emphasis on winning. I mean, somebody has to win and wouldn't it be much nicer of us to just let the other fellas beat us and make them happy. Pretty soon, who knows? They might return the favor.

The campus housing problem would be no problem if we stopped worrying so much about personal space. In Russia, one of our residence hall rooms could probably pass as a two-family condo.

And wouldn't Farrell Library seem much nicer if we stopped making quality education such a priority? Instead of looking at Farrell as an embarrassment, we should take pride in what we have. Has anyone else ever seen so many books crammed into such a small space? And have you ever seen such a fine example of conflicting architecture?

Who knows... after solving K-States' so-called problems, we might take on the world.

Solving the problems in the Middle East will be a piece of cake once we've convinced everyone that where you live isn't nearly as important as where you vacation. (How ya' gonna' keep em' down on the farm after they've seen Orlando.)

Central America's problems will disappear as soon as we Americans learn just how much fun being exploited can be.

In fact, world peace in general would receive quite a boost if we could all just agree to a few moderate goals.

First, keep your expectations moderate. You cannot have it all. We can't all be number one, and wealth is no substitute for a good night's sleep.

Secondly, do a good turn every day. All right, I know most Boy Scouts are geeks, but they have a nice idea here, and once you've helped an old lady across the street, you never go back.

And finally, agree to disagree. Anyone who believes in something so strongly that he is willing to kill someone over it is taking himself entirely too seriously. That goes for both of you.

These are all just thoughts, mind you. I certainly wouldn't want to step on anyone's toes by going out on a limb.

Task force appointed at inappropriate time

Student Body President Todd Johnson and many other students, faculty members and administrators have been working to raise awareness of the problems of Farrell Library. They talked to legislators and Board of Regents members, and even resorted to a library sit-in. They should be commended for their effort.

But this week, Johnson and Student Senate have a new cause to champion: the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Johnson and other members of the Senate have formed a task force to study expanding the rec center. According to Ray Robel, director of Rec Services, this expansion would cost between $3.5 million and $4 million.

One has to wonder what the priorities of student government really are. Is the library the most important project, or are we in greater need of more racquetball courts and basketball goals?

While the rec center may in fact be in need of expansion, the fact that the subject has been brought up at this time shows an extremely poor sense of timing. The same officials that have been lobbied on behalf of the library are going to look at the rec center issue and conclude that funding Farrell is not that important.

So why are Johnson and the Senate worrying about the rec center now? Their preliminary plan for funding the project is to continue collecting the $22-per-semester fee students are paying toward the bond issue that funded the K-State Union, KSU Stadium and the original construction of the rec center. The bonds will not be retired until 1995, so Johnson and the Senate could have waited until a solution was found for the library funding, before focusing attention elsewhere.

Bringing up the issue of expanding the rec center at this time was a foolhardy move. It gives the appearance that the students of our University whine to the state about funding of the library, but are willing to dish out millions of dollars for fun and games.

Are greeks evil?

Editor,

This is a letter concerning Scot Keimig's letter to Jill Hayden in the Feb. 6 Collegian.

You accuse Jill Hayden (Ripple cartoonist) of maliciously bashing the greek system because you claim she has some deep-seated hostility towards greeks. You then claim her use of the word "frat" is "in very poor taste" because it "brings up connotations of malice as well as misconceptions." Hmmm. Well Scot, have you ever wondered why these connotations have stuck so diligently to the greek system? Could it be possible that Jill's description of many fraternity members as frat guys who drink a lot of beer and make sexist comments are not a manifestation of strange hostility on Jill's part, but are instead a realistic observation? I happen to know that within the two years I was part of the greek system and the one year I haven't been, a few fraternities and even (gasp!) sororities have been put on social probation for hazing problems and have had their hands slapped for incidents concerning alcohol. You seem appalled by the reputation fraternity members have as beer guzzlers, but that is in fact what fraternity and sorority members do at their functions — drink a lot of beer. In fact, I distinctly remember a function where the fraternity members circled around their house mother as she bonged a beer. Of course, not all members of the greek system drink, but many do and this is why they have a reputation as such.

Now would you like to discuss sexist comments? Why don't we remember the fraternity T-shirt incident of last semester in which the cartoons printed on the T-shirts had connotations of rape? And what about the annual calendar girl contest where women (the majority of whom are sorority members) are paraded scantily clad through a bar, asked sexually leading questions, and who are then judged on how firm their bikinis are? That is certainly an example of a "sexist comment" if I've ever heard one.

You also express a belief that the greeks are "striving for better cooperation" between themselves and those who choose not to pay for a whole bunch of brothers and sisters, and that Jill is habitually "perpetuating" a "derogatory mindset" about greeks. Interestingly enough, it's more than obvious from your letter that greeks have a distinct "mindset" of their own. This is evident by simply taking a trip to the K-State Union where you'll see that greeks usually hang out with their own, date their own, and think of those who are not interested in streaking naked through the streets as pledges, or in singing cute little songs with pseudo-siblings, as those who are strange! You describe independents (and very condescendingly so) as "those students who have chosen alternative living arrangements," as if being a fraternity member is the only acceptable way to go and that everything else is an "alternative" to that blessed way of life.

In your letter you beseech Jill to stop "picking on" greeks because they "seek out to work together for the benefit of K-State." Well, it's true that the majority of those involved in student government are greeks, but this is because they have an automatic living group of buddies who will vote for them simply because they're a part of their club. And doesn't this sound like they're basically just trying to help themselves?

You claim to realize that greeks "aren't perfect and don't claim to be" but at the same time your letter exemplifies a holier-than-thou attitude maybe you aren't aware you have.

Before condemning Jill's "mindset" which she has every right to hold, you should take a good look at your own and realize that the "mindsets" like yours are the ones that have created some of the bad perceptions independents have of greeks.

Elizabeth Rogers

Clarification

Editor,

As the president of Speech Unlimited, K-State's forensics team, I would like to applaud the Collegian's commitment to covering many diverse activities. However, the article about the forensics team that appeared in Thursday's Collegian contained several misunderstandings that we would like to clarify.

First, the interpretation events, not the public speaking events, are taken from plays, prose and poetry. The speech topics mentioned, such as killer bees, are not for interpretation events.

Secondly, we do not debate. The duo on abortion referred to consists not of speeches, but of a cutting from a play. The play looks at each side of the abortion question. The play's intention is to explore both sides, rather than to support any particular view. More importantly, it is definitely not a debate, but a dramatization of both sides of the controversy.

Finally, allow us to comment that while we may not have the funding to fly to California for a tournament, we are very grateful to have the funding to compete at all. The tournaments that we do compete in usually have anywhere from 20 to 30 schools competing. As our first-place wins at four of the last five tournaments we attended indicate, we are a highly motivated, dedicated team.

Once again, thank you for your coverage of our activity. Anyone interested in further information can contact either me or our advisor Craig Brown in Nichols Hall.

List misleading

Editor,

The information meeting for the scheduled spring break Grand Canyon trip was at 7 p.m., Feb. 6. It was stated that 40 people could go on the trip and the sign-up would be the following morning at 8. Some people knew the little secret, to be able to go on the trip you must camp out at the K-State Union in order to guarantee yourself to be in the top 40.

People were at the Union as early as 1 a.m., with backpacks, sleeping bags and the whole works. A list of 40 was started among the campers, but there was one hangup. The evening previous, eight Union Program Council committee members already signed up on the official list.

Personally, I was at the Union at 6:20 a.m., with orange juice in my belly and number 34 on the campers list. Little did I know of the big disappointment. At 9:30 a.m. dreams of the Grand Canyon were demolished and I had missed two important classes and sleep. Lack of communication? I, like others, heard them perfectly — 40!

I'm going solo.

A Conceived as an Artist

Margo Kren: Distinguished Art In Manhattan

There has never been any doubt in Margo Kren's mind that art was the right profession for her.

Kren, associate professor in art, said her artistic talents surfaced when she was a child.

"I've always been an artist," she said. "As a child I was always drawing and it seemed to come easy for me."

Kren came to K-State in 1971 and since then has taught graduate seminar, drawing, design, life drawing and painting classes.

An award-winning artist, Kren received the distinguished graduate faculty member award this year. She also won the Kansas Governor's Art Award this year and received the National Endowment for the Arts Grant in 1982.

Kren said she primarily works with acrylic on canvas or paper. She has also worked in oils and caustic paints.

Some of Kren's works have been sold to university, corporate and private collections.

She has seriously been an artist for the last 20 years, she said. Every year more and more of her works are sold.

"I consider myself half businesswoman and half educator," Kren said.

Kren's artistic abilities are versatile.

"I can go between abstracts to realistic," she said. "Both avenues are important to me at various times for various reasons."

Recently Kren finished 20

charcoal drawings for a book accepted by Milkweed Editions. The book will feature her drawings and the poems of a Santa Fe, N.M., poet, Miriam Sagan.

The works run parallel to each other, Kren said.

"Her poems do not explain my drawings nor do my drawings illustrate her poems," she said.

The book is expected to come out in late 1990 or early 1991, Kren said.

She said she prefers not to work under commission because it limits her work.

"If people like the work and see something they like, it is better that way," Kren said.

Kren gets inspiration for her work in many different ways. She said she might be directly influenced by seeing someone wearing a sweater which is the right color for a painting. Or, she can see another's work and come up with an idea of what she wants to do.

The structure and content of literature also influences her work, Kren said.

Kren has a large garage studio for creating large paintings and has a smaller studio in her home for the creation of smaller works.

Julie Strecker, of Strecker Gallery in downtown Manhattan, is Kren's dealer. Some of Kren's work is on display at the gallery.

A group of her lithographs called "Dreams and Memories" is on display at several university galleries including the Sheldon Art Memorial Gallery at the University of Nebraska. Her suite is also on display at the Spencer Museum in Lawrence and at the Southbend Art Center in Southbend, Ind., she said.

She also has a traveling show of lithographs which have been on tour in the United States since 1984.

Kren's future plans include establishing galleries on either the East or West Coast or both.

She also plans to expand her work by converting to a larger size canvas or paper.

Kren received her master of fine arts from the University of Iowa.

TOP: Margo Kren, associate professor in art, sits under a roof window in her upstairs studio putting the final touches on a charcoal drawing of the plants and the view out of the window.

LEFT: A wall in the upstairs studio serves Kren as a diary. She pins up cards that friends send her as well as memorabilia from excursions, like the straw hat she decorated with dried weeds from the Konza prairie.

BELOW: Kren stands in a wall-high rack which holds dozens of her large paintings in a double garage. The garage is equipped with translucent garage doors and skylights to serve as a studio and workspace to build frames for her paintings.

Wildcats topple No. 1 Mizzou

K-State's Steve Henson grabs a rebound while fighting off the tight Mizzou defense of Missouri guard Anthony Peeler, hidden, who blocks out Wildcat forward Billy Ray Smith. The Wildcats upset the No. 1-ranked Missouri Tigers 65-58, in Bramlage Coliseum Thursday night.

By David Svoboda

And the heart and soul shall lead them.

K-State, with senior point guard Steve Henson scoring 16 of his 18 points in a frantic final 10:30 of the game, downed No. 1 Missouri 65-58 Thursday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

Henson, who had been held scoreless over the first 25:45 of the game, hit 7-of-8 free throws over the final 3:54 of the contest, including six straight in the final minute.

"He wanted it every chance he could get down the stretch, and when he got it, he delivered," K-State coach Lon Kruger said of Henson.

After K-State had tied the game at 14-14 with 8:49 left in the first half, the Wildcats had fought an uphill battle to stay in the contest. Missouri stretched its advantage to eight on three separate occasions in the second half.

But when Henson hit a short turnaround from the right of the basket with 6:52 left, K-State had clawed its way back to a 47-47 tie. The bucket was Henson's first field goal of the night that found the bottom of the net. His only previous fielder came on a goal-tending call.

After Henson's shot tied the game, Doug Smith followed a missed Missouri shot with a tip-in, putting the Tigers back in front, 49-47, with 6:26 left.

But Henson had an answer, and a loud one at that.

Taking a pass from Tony Massop, who had the ball in the paint and kicked it back outside, Henson buried a three-pointer from the right wing, giving K-State its first lead since the 16-minute mark of the first half, 50-49, with 5:41 remaining.

It was a lead the Wildcats never lost.

With Henson leading the way, K-State stretched the advantage to as many as 10, 65-55, before Anthony Peeler hit a three-pointer with eight seconds left to cut the final margin to seven. Peeler led Missouri with 18.

"When you get a lead and get it in his (Henson's) hands, it's a pretty good feeling," Kruger said of his point guard's efforts over the final five-plus minutes.

Despite Henson's nightmarish first half — he went 0-for-6 from the floor, including five missed three-point attempts — his teammates' confidence in the preseason choice as Big Eight Player of the Year never wavered.

Guard Jean Derouillere, who led all scorers with 24 points, said intangibles set Henson apart from all others, even when he's not having a

Lady Cats look for 2nd straight

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

Interim Lady Cats coach Gaye Griffin found out what her team was made of Wednesday night after it bounced back from its first conference loss of the season to beat Nebraska, 60-58, in Bramlage Coliseum.

"We probably had our best practices of the year," Griffin said of Monday and Tuesday's workouts after the loss at Missouri Sunday. "We were able to bounce back tonight (Wednesday) and that's the sign of a Big Eight champion ball club."

Now the Lady Cats will see how they bounce back on the road at Boulder, Colo., Sunday when they meet the Lady Buffs in a 2 p.m. matchup.

Colorado will be looking to gain a little bit of revenge this time around. In the two teams' first meeting of the season, the Lady Cats pulled away late in the ball game to pick up a 71-67 victory.

K-State may just have fate on their side Sunday at the CU Events Center. Colorado had an 18-game home, regular-season winning streak snapped Wednesday in a loss against Missouri, so the Colorado emotion may not be as high come Sunday, said K-State assistant coach Susan Kubala.

"The one thing good about us going in there is that Colorado had its home winning streak broken," Kubala said. "Not too many teams win at Colorado, and we were able to beat Nebraska at Nebraska this year for the first time in a long time, so that was a big confidence booster for us."

"This is just another opportunity to change fate and change the history there."

Colorado, now 12-10 on the year and 5-4 in the conference, is led by Kansas native Debbie Johnson. The 6-foot-5 center from Lorraine via Barton County Community College, is averaging 12.3 points and 5.4 rebounds per game. In the contest at Bramlage, Johnson led the Lady Buffs with 16 points.

Also in double figures for Colorado is 5-foot-7 guard Benita Martin. Martin is averaging 10.5 points a game.

The Lady Cats will counter with a balanced scoring attack which had been spread mostly between three juniors. Diana Miller leads the way at 17 points a game, while Nadira Hazim is averaging 15.9 and Kristie Bahner 10.5. Miller and Bahner also are averaging six rebounds a game.

Tracksters at competitive Nebraska meet

By Dan Wicker
Sports Reporter

The K-State men's and women's track teams will again be in action today and Saturday at the Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb.

The meet will boast most of the top teams in the nation and almost all of the Big Eight teams, according to Coach John Capriotti, who said it should be one of the most competitive meets of the season.

"It is the top collegiate meet of the year indoors," Capriotti said. "It has gotten better and better every year."

The meet has grown so large it has become necessary for Nebraska to split it into three sessions beginning Friday evening and continuing Saturday morning and evening. The meet officials have also been forced to run more preliminary and semifinal races because of the amount of competition.

Capriotti believes this will be a critical meet for his squad, even though team scores will not be kept.

"I think the level of competition we are facing will be very important," Capriotti said. "It's getting down to crunch time with only two weeks until the Big Eight meet."

Capriotti said K-State has the individuals who can compete in this type of meet, but he also knows they had better come to compete because the competition level will be very intense.

"We have individuals that can compete with these people, but at a meet of this caliber, we need to be ready to go when we get there," Capriotti said. "It is important that they get ready to compete. It is a very competitive meet in all events."

Recently, Capriotti has been most pleased with the women jumpers and throwers, as well as the distance corps. He said he has also noticed improvement in the sprinters and expects to see Joy Jones and Markeya Jones have good performances this weekend.

K-State will take the trip to Lincoln without some of the team's top placers and scorers. Charles Armstead and Latricia Joyner are out with hamstring strains. Clifton Etheridge's status is unknown for this weekend while he is still recovering from tonsillitis. Janet Haskin will sit this meet out to recover completely from the flu, and Thomas Randolph will be out with a quadracep strain.

K-State has several athletes who rank among the top in the Big Eight Conference.

On the women's side, Joy Jones has the fifth best 55-meter time, and the third best 400-meter time, Markeya Jones ranks third in the 200 meter. Janet Treiber, Paulette Staats and Angie Berry rank second, third and fourth respectively in the mile, while Haskin sits atop the 3,000-meter times. Carla Shannon holds down second in the long jump. The top spot in the triple jump, Connie Teaberry, is third in the high jump, and Angie Miller is first in the shot-put throw.

On the men's side, Randolph is fourth on the 55-meter list, Tyrone Watkins is ranked fifth in the 400 meter and sixth in the 600 yard with Marcus Wright right behind him in seventh. David Warders is fourth among the 3,000-meter competition and second in the 5,000 meters. Armstead is third in the 55-meter hurdles and the long jump. Etheridge is ranked fifth in the long jump and teams with Dwayne Murphy and Orlo Berry to rank second, fourth and fifth in the triple jump.

After this weekend's meet, the K-State tracksters will play host to their third home meet of the year. The KSU Open begins Feb. 16, and there will be three days of competition.

Prepster tallies 101 in 1st half

By The Associated Press

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — Points: 101. Field goals: 37. Free throws: 27. Minutes: 16.

Not just another game for Lisa Leslie. Not even a full game. Just half a game.

"I'd shoot jumpers inside the paint, off the drive, fake one way and go the other, whatever," the 6-foot-5 Leslie said. "I was jumping in my sleep last night."

It was a performance that belied believability.

Leslie's coach couldn't believe it. Even Leslie thought she was seeing things. And her Morning-side High School team's opponent, South Torrance High School, had seen enough.

South Torrance called it quits at halftime Wednesday night, walking off the court with the score 102-24.

Leslie, who scored all but one point for the Monarchs, was four points short of the national high school record of 105 by former Southern Cal All-American Cheryl Miller.

After the first eight-minute quarter, Leslie looked at the scoreboard and realized she already had 49 points, far ahead of the 25-point pace she had set for herself.

"I asked my teammates, 'This is the first quarter?' " Leslie said. "I was thinking the score was so high it had to be halftime. I almost couldn't believe it."

Late in the second quarter, two South Torrance players fouled out, leaving the team with only four available players. So when coach Gil Ramirez refused to let his team play on, officials assessed four technical fouls for delay of game. Leslie made all four, giving her 105 points, but officials later nullified the points and ruled the game a forfeit.

Leslie, who has averaged about 24 points per game, was hoping to continue a tradition at Morning-side, one in which Coach Frank Scott encourages his seniors to score as many points as possible in their final home game.

"I knew she was capable of going for the record, and I wanted her to do it," said Scott, who has guided Morningside to 85 straight league wins, dating back to the 1982-83 season.

But he and Leslie didn't think it would be as easy as it was, even against South Torrance, a team whose tallest player is about 6-0 and that Morningside (21-3) defeated 84-26 earlier in the season.

Leslie, who shot 37-of-56 from the field and 27-of-34 from the line, is quick to point out that she played a full-court game. "I played defense," she said. "I defended their point guard instead of their post, so I would be in the backcourt and the one they could outlet to. If I knew the girl was going to miss, I would head down-court sooner."

K-State center John Rettiger, assistant coach Greg Gensing and head coach Lon Kruger agonize over a K-State shot attempt late in the second half. During the final minutes of Thursday night's upset over No. 1 Missouri, the K-State bench was a gallery of emotion every play.

Wildcats' defense keys victory

By David Svoboda
Sports Reporter

The only thing lower than the collective egos of the Missouri players Thursday night in Bramlage Coliseum was the Tigers' shooting percentage.

A tenacious K-State defense forced Missouri into 28.8 percent shooting from the floor in handing the top-ranked Tigers a 65-58 defeat.

"Give them a lot of credit. They took us out of our game with their defense and we started worrying about too many things," said Tigers coach Norm Stewart. "We let their pressure mentally get us out of our game."

K-State ran nine different players in and out of the contest at various times in an attempt to keep Missouri off stride. Key to that rotation, according to K-State coach Lon Kruger, was the play of the Wildcat inside players.

Starters John Rettiger and Billy Ray Smith joined reserves Tony Massop and Lance Simmons in helping contain Missouri's inside duo of Doug Smith and Nathan Buntin. The pair combined for just 21 points when they had been averaging 32-plus.

"We pretty much just rotated around," Kruger said of his movement of inside players on and off the bench. "We never really gave up any easy stuff inside."

Guard Steve Henson, who keyed the K-State victory with his offensive play late, said that the work inside and out defensively was equally important.

"We just tried to take away their strengths," Henson said. "We were talking about not letting their inside people just turn around and get the shot off, but then also not letting their perimeter people get in rhythm."

Those perimeter players for Missouri never quite got into synch.

Guard Anthony Peeler, who was played defensively by virtually every Wildcat in some combination or another, was forced into a 5-for-20 shooting night. The Missouri guards shot a combined 9-of-32.

"We lost patience offensively," Stewart said. "We have been so good at having trust in each other. We didn't show that in the late stages."

Kruger also pointed to a tenacious Tiger defense, which pressured his Wildcats into a 38.9 percent shooting night, with a great deal of respect.

"The fact that we didn't shoot the ball well and Missouri didn't shoot the ball well indicates that both teams played good defense," Kruger said. "That's what we were hoping for. Both clubs had a lot of opportunities but were unable to convert because of good defense."

'Cats

great night on paper.

"Even when he doesn't shoot the ball well, he's a coach on the floor," Derouillere said. "We all drain on his emotions. We get our spark from him."

The response Henson gets from his teammates is evident to his coach.

"The team has got a great deal of respect for Steve," Kruger said. "He fights, scratches and wants the ball, and the other guys respect that."

Henson, who had seen his team struggle through a three-game conference losing streak for the first time since he and Kruger arrived in Manhattan four years ago, admitted he hit a low in the first half.

"A few of those shots in the first half weren't taken with a lot of confidence," he said. "But whatever I lost in the first half, I thought I got back in the second half."

Prior to Henson's re-discovery of his game offensively, it was Derouillere who all but single-handedly kept the Wildcats in the game.

The junior transfer had 13 of K-State's first 17 points in the second half, with the goal tend on the Henson shot and a pair of Henson free throws being the only other K-State points in the opening 11:52.

"Jean's contribution was very important," Kruger said. "Steve wasn't shooting it particularly well early, and we needed someone to come in and pick up the slack."

With the 24 points, Derouillere became the first Wildcat to have back-to-back 20-plus games this season.

The win, K-State's first under Kruger against a No. 1-ranked team, lifted the Wildcats to 13-10 overall and 3-4 in Big Eight play. Missouri fell to 21-2 and 7-1. The Wildcats now lead the all-time series with the Tigers 100-89, and have won three straight against Missouri in Manhattan.

But all those numbers won't mean much to Kruger, Henson and Co. if the Wildcats can't string together back-to-back victories. Colorado comes to Bramlage for a 1:10 tipoff Saturday afternoon.

"We've got to lace 'em up and play on Saturday," Kruger said. "If we give it (the momentum gained by the victory) back on Saturday, this game doesn't mean a whole lot for the season."

The deadline for the Feb. 15 intramural wrestling tournament is Friday. Entry forms, accompanied by the entry fee, must be turned in to the Recreational Services office at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex by 5 p.m.

Competition will include both women's and men's divisions, and the tournament does count toward intramural team points. The tournament is scheduled for 7 p.m. Feb. 15.

The next intramural deadline is for the March 1 bench press meet. Entries can be turned in starting Feb. 19, and the deadline is 5 p.m. Feb. 23.

The next intramural manager's meeting is scheduled for 4 p.m. March 7 in the K-State Union Big Eight Room.

Basketball Hall elects 3

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — Elvin Hayes, one of the game's best power forwards, and guards Earl Monroe and Dave Bing were elected today to the Basketball Hall of Fame.

Also to be inducted May 15 is the late Neil Johnston, a hook-shot artist with the Philadelphia Warriors who led the NBA in scoring in three straight years in the 1950s. The four will join 168 individuals and four teams in the Hall of Fame in this city where basketball was born nearly a century ago.

"It's just unreal," Hayes said in an interview from his car dealership in Cleveland, Texas. "It's just like winning your first high school basketball championship or your first NBA championship. It's just one of those feelings. You work so hard and have your dreams and then it happens."

Hayes, who played for the Houston Rockets and Baltimore Bullets, said he was delighted at being in such good company this year.

Grain extruder to be dedicated

By Clinton Wolf
Collegian Reporter

A machine used in the production of many breakfast cereals and most pet foods has been acquired by the Department of Grain Science and Industry.

The twin-screw grain extruder was installed in September and will be dedicated April 7, said Charles W. Deyoe, head of the department.

Wenger Manufacturing Co. of Sabetha, a manufacturer of this type of machinery, donated the extruder, which will be used for research, training and teaching.

Don Wenger, vice president of Wenger Manufacturing, said the machine costs about $250,000 and can be used to produce breakfast cereals such as Cheerios and Alpha-Bits.

The ingredients for the cereal, including flours and additives, are fed into the machine, which then forms these ingredients into the shape and form of the cereal. From there, the cereal usually goes on to a toasting process, and perhaps a sugar-coating process, Wenger said.

The machine can also be used to produce microwavable pasta, dry expanded pet foods and commercial fish foods, Wenger said.

"It's state-of-the-art equipment," he said. "As far as we know, we're the only company in the United States manufacturing this type of equipment."

Most competition is from Western European nations, he said.

Wenger said the machine is becoming popular in the industry because of it uses less energy, space and manpower than conventional methods.

"It's the direction the grain processing industry is moving," Wenger said.

He said it is important for the University to have research equipment comparable to that being used in the industry.

"We're glad to see K-State catch up with the industry," Wenger said. "It's desirable that K-State stay in the lead among universities doing this type of research."

The University has worked with Wenger Manufacturing Co. for "many, many years," Wenger said. Students have come to Wenger Manufacturing Co.'s research center for value-added grain products.

New flag, granite seal finish work on gate

By Clinton Wolf
Collegian Reporter

The installation of a granite University seal and the raising of a new University flag last week marked the finishing touches at the Higinbotham Gate.

John Fairman, assistant vice president for institutional advancement, said two of 12 flags are being used, one at the gate and one in front of Bramlage Coliseum. The flags arrived last week.

A flag is not flying over Anderson Hall, Fairman said. The flagpole on that building is scheduled to be removed because of roof construction.

Larry Garvin, director of facilities planning, said the seal is finished except for sealing its joints. Until then, it will be covered to keep moisture out, he said.

"We were surprised we found good weather in January to install it," Garvin said.

The seal is 10 feet in diameter, said Mark Taussig, landscape architect for the University. The seal was purchased from Cold Springs Granite Co. of Cold Springs, Minn., with funds for the gate. It weighs three tons and is four inches thick.

"We had to provide (the company) with a full size drawing of the seal before it could be engraved," Taussig said.

The drawing was made into a mask over the granite, and the image of the seal was then sandblasted into the stone, he said.

It was transported by truck to the gate where "they just pulled up and put it in," Taussig said.

Valerie Spicher, assistant director of University publications, created the flag design.

One of the flags is an indoor flag with gold edging and its own standard, Fairman said.

Taussig said a bronze plaque listing donors will be installed at the Higinbotham gate in a few weeks. The Class of 1976 is among the donors. Since the University no longer operates on a class system, he said, the gate is probably one of the last class gifts.

Students aid elderly

By Bill Sier
Collegian Reporter

The Community Service Program is aimed at students who are waiting for an opportunity to help out.

"I don't believe in the 'selfish college student' stereotype," said Carol Peak, director of the program.

The program is actually a combination of services, all related to some form of community action, she said. Some are strictly volunteer, while others provide a stipend.

Funding for the program comes from a variety of sources, including Educational Opportunity Funds. Other sources, however, include grants from the Fund for the Improvement of Post-Secondary Education and the W. K. Kellogg Foundation, Peak said.

She said the program also receives some support from the work-study program for those projects that provide a stipend.

The Link-age program places K-State students with elderly area residents who may need a little help around the house, said Melanie Starns, coordinator for the Elderserve program and a 1989 graduate. In return for the student's help and companionship, the student gets a place to live.

"Students and participants are carefully screened," Starns said. The program is currently accepting applications for next year's placements.

For those elderly who don't need someone on a full-time basis, there is Home Serve. Starns said this is a volunteer program in which a student will help out at the elderly person's home on a temporary basis, doing things such as mowing the lawn or shoveling snow.

Elderserve also has Elderserve Teams. These teams go out into communities throughout the state to work on projects specifically designed to enhance or improve the lives of its elderly residents. Starns said she not only has teams that go out from K-State, but she also trains and coordinates teams in other parts of the state.

There is also the Volunteer Network, formerly known as the Community Service Clearinghouse. This service matches students with various volunteer efforts in the area, said Michelle Dutton, student coordinator for the program and sophomore in business administration.

This year the program is taking a more active role in setting up its own projects and hopes to have a project each month, Dutton said.

"I think this is a good experience for college students," she said. "Many people come into the CSP for experience, but get more out of it than they expect."

The Summer Team project is probably the best known of the CSP programs. Students spend most of their summer vacation working in a Kansas community on a specific project. The projects are submitted by the communities and are selected for the program based on such criteria as the amount of community support and the project's feasibility.

"We try to work with the community, for the community," Peak said.

This summer, 42 students will participate in the program on nine projects, such as identifying and designing interpretive trails on Lake Wacanda. These students will receive a $1,500 stipend for their work and must attend training classes the semester prior to the projects. During the semester, they will also visit the community where they will be working, to get used to the job.

Community Structural Assistance Volunteer Effort, or SAVE, is a series of one-day projects designed to help a community with construction or maintenance jobs, such as clearing brush or repairing playground equipment.

On Feb. 24, SAVE is going to Summerfield to help convert an old gymnasium into a community roller skating rink.

Students who go on these projects are not paid. The community provides lunch, and CSP provides transportation.

"You come away from a SAVE project with the feeling that you really meant something to that town," said Sharon Patnode, student SAVE coordinator and senior in political science.

"All teams are interdisciplinary," Peak said. There is no particular type of student sought out by CSP. If a student has a particular interest or area of expertise, then they will try to use them in that capacity.

The newest CSP program is the Youth Education Service. YES is a tutoring and mentoring program for at-risk middle and high school students in the Manhattan and Topeka area.

"Help is needed in all subjects, but math seems to be the greatest need," Starns said. College students who participate in this program are paid.

Festival to feature local jazz students

Mark Butler

REVIEW

The thought of jazz evokes different concepts for different people. Late nights on Bourbon Street in New Orleans. The sublime sounds of Charlie Parker and John Coltrane. The Basie Band playing in Kansas City long ago.

Manhattan, Kan., probably does not spring to mind as a hotbed for the genre. However, events on campus today should prove that jazz is definitely alive here.

The sweet tones of jazz will be spilling out of Forum Hall in the K-State Union from 8 a.m. until 5 p.m. today. The purveyors of those sounds are on campus to participate in the Central States Jazz Festival.

The festival is a competition for area high school and community college jazz ensembles. However, festival organizer Ben Rohrer, director of jazz studies, assures that the event is more than just a contest.

Rohrer said the festival is a vehicle for performance for the bands. In total, 16 groups will be competing in two categories — one for high schools and one for community colleges.

In addition to those bands, festival participants and audience members will be treated to performances by the KSU Concert Jazz Ensemble and guest clinician Dave Rickenberg.

As is often the case with music festivals of this sort, a reknown musician is invited to perform and to share stylistic secrets. Saxophonist Rickenberg, formerly of jazz-rock pioneers Blood, Sweat and Tears, will serve in that capacity for the Central States Jazz Festival.

Rickenberg will perform at 12:15 p.m. in a combination clinic and performance. He will be backed by K-State students Mike Fettes on piano, Byron Durey on bass and Tom Bolton on drums. All are members of the KSU Concert Jazz Ensemble.

The full complement of that group will perform immediately before Rickenberg at noon. The eighteen-member ensemble will be directed by festival organizer Rohrer. Featured musicians include Fettes and Henry Ashwood on saxophone.

"The Central States Jazz Festival is the oldest jazz festival in the state. It dates back to the early '70s," Rohrer said.

Each group involved in the contest will perform for about 20 minutes. All participating groups are from Kansas schools — 13 high schools and three community colleges.

The competing schools will be judged by a panel of three including Bill McFarlin, the director of the International Association of Jazz Educators, which is sponsoring the event.

The judging varies depending on the schools involved. The three community colleges will be ranked based on their performances.

An awards ceremony will be at 5:30 p.m. to recognize the top performances of outstanding ensembles and soloists.

All festival activities will be in Forum Hall and will be open to the public. There will be no admission charge.

Dancers thrill audience

Laura Scroggins

REVIEW

Just how awesome does a man have to be to get a group of screaming women to take their bras off and throw them onto the stage? "Six-foot-two and eyes of blue," said Mark Anthony, the master of ceremonies for the Elite Male, a group of exotic male dancers who performed Tuesday night at Baystreet.

He was right. That's all it took. These men had more going for them than their eyes, however. And they were more than willing to give the women in the audience a taste of what that might be. Literally. Between the dollar kisses and the three- and five-dollar "Grand Slams", described as "voluntary torture" by a member of the audience, it would suffice to say they had a good night.

All of model quality, these men are involved in other activities aside from their dancing. One was repeatedly referred to as "Mr. February", although from what magazine, I'm not sure. Another was billed as an ex-Chippendale's dancer from Los Angeles, and yet another was the holder of a body building title.

Even without their various titles, these men were HOT.

We're talking hunger buns here. Each of these guys works out to maintain just the right amount of tone. Not too muscular, just enough to make the girls drool.

They also have wonderful tans, which as Kansas residents, they must have gotten at a tanning salon.

Overall, as individuals, their performances were good. Each dancer had his own character and routine to go through and for the most part, the dancing was mouth-watering.

As a group, however, they needed a little more practice. Two or three numbers were performed together, and it was hard not to notice them watching each other's feet and stopping periodically to get back on the beat of the music.

Although not the best male dancers around, and certainly not the most professional, these men did have what it takes to mesmerize an audience and rake in the tips.

Inn's fixtures Victorian

By Clinton Wolf
Collegian Reporter

When walking into Victorian Reflections Bed and Breakfast in downtown Abilene, it's hard not to look up.

The high ceiling of this store-front business is covered with stamped, white tin panels. A tarnished brass fan hangs from its center.

"It's sort of the Victorian version of our modern acoustic ceiling," Nanc Scholl said.

The building originally had a vaulted ceiling, she said.

Scholl and her husband Bill are partners in Victorian Reflections with Don and Diana McBride. Both couples are Abilene residents.

The inn is more than 100 years old. It is furnished with chairs, fainting couches, porcelain bathroom fixtures and brass light fixtures dating from the Victorian period.

Queen Victoria reigned in Great Britain from 1837 to 1901 and gave her name to the elegant and often frivolous style of the era.

"(Queen Victoria) decorated however she wanted to, and it's that aspect we grabbed on to," said Nanc Scholl.

She said more ornate styling, whether reflected in tin ceilings or lace dresses, marked the period.

Homer Socolofsky, professor of history, said part of Queen Victoria's influence is reflected in the dark colors used.

"The clothing (of the period) is dark in color and that's due to the fact that her husband died during the U.S. Civil War," Socolofsky said.

Women who imitated the queen wore dark fashions, he said.

Socolofsky also said that the furniture of the period was very ornate.

"It was not utilitarian at all," he said.

John McCulloh, head of the history department, said the influence of Queen Victoria's reign could be attributed to several things.

"Part of it is because she reigned so long," McCulloh said.

Socolofsky said that Mark Twain dubbed the period "The Gilded Age," referring to the thin coating of gold used on picture frames. What Twain meant by this, Socolofsky said, was that many things had an ornate covering.

The McBrides purchased the two-story building in January 1989 and began restoration.

The second story was renovated into four bedrooms, a dining room, a drawing room and a community bathroom. The first story became a gift shop selling original Victorian clothing, furniture and other items.

Susan Tolley, owner of Tussy Mussy, a Manhattan gift shop which specializes in Victorian gifts, said the Victorian look is coming into style.

"We're finding that people are starting to appreciate the old lace and dresses," she said.

The Victorian look has gained popularity over the past several years, she said.

In February 1989 the Scholls moved to Abilene and joined the McBrides as partners in the business. The two couples do all the work related to the inn, including preparing a full breakfast which is served to guests each morning.

Nanc Scholl and Diana McBride said the building had been used for many different purposes before they acquired it in January of 1989.

"It was a grocery store, a butcher shop, a (hat shop), a bakery and a paint store. And an inn," Nanc Scholl said. She said that the last owners had used the building as a paint store with glass cutting shops upstairs.

Diana McBride said that the heyday of the building was likely the same as Abilene, from the 1880s to the 1890s. During that time, such figures as Joseph McCoy, who established the Chisholm Trail, were prominent. One of the four rooms in the inn is named after McCoy. Other rooms honor Abilene natives who have a part in the history of the town.

Socolofsky said many ornate buildings were constructed during the period due to the low cost of labor.

"When you build a building (like that) today, you have a very high labor cost which makes it very expensive to add extras," he said.

The inn was recently included in a directory of bed and breakfast inns in Kansas, published by the K-State Small Business Development Center.

'Big river' flows to McCain

By Mark Schreiner
Collegian Reviewer

Billed as a mix of today's country music and yesterday's barn dances, the Broadway musical "Big River" will flow in McCain Auditorium at 3:30 p.m. Sunday.

The musical, nominated for 10 Tony awards and winning seven in 1985, is a nearly three-hour stage adaptation of Mark Twain's masterpiece "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn."

More than 1,400 tickets have been sold and Richard Martin, director of McCain, said he expects a near-full house.

The musical is directed by Curt Wollan and was adapted for the stage by William Hauptman. Featured characters include Huck, played by Ty Hreben, and Jim, played by Mark Lawrence, as well as the widow Douglas, Tom Sawyer and Huck's pop, Pap.

The orchestra includes banjo, guitar, mandolin, harmonica and fiddle. "Big River" features 17 gospel and country tunes from the piano and pen of Roger Miller instead of grand production numbers with lines of dancers.

Martin said the show was booked because "the time was right and the show was right. I'd seen the show when it was on Broadway and I knew it was a clever production."

The plot generally follows that of Twain's novel, set in the 1840s, he said. Huck and Jim escape St. Petersburg, Mo., and float down the Mississippi. Along the way they confront a pair of con artists, a trio of sisters and Tom Sawyer's relatives.

Martin said some episodes from the novel are omitted and some toned down for the production which is aimed at all ages. Some critics have mourned the loss of some of Twain's moral subtlety and blunt sarcasm.

"Big River" also has the unique opportunity to fix Twain's ending of "Huck Finn," which has been regarded by some as weak.

Martin said he sides with those in praise of "Big River."

"When I went, I wanted an interesting evening of theater," he said. "If I wanted to read 'Huck Finn,' I'd read 'Huck Finn.'"

Martin said "Big River" should be judged on its own merits.

"It's asking an awful lot of the writer to make it a musical and still retain the bite, the humor and the sophistication," he said. "I don't think anybody should ever expect of a Broadway musical that it would do justice to a major work of literature."

Senate committee opens hearings on abortion

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Senate committee opened the Legislature's deliberations on abortion legislation Thursday, hearing conflicting testimony on a proposal that would essentially end abortions at the state's premier public hospital.

The proposal before the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee is modeled after a Missouri law that was upheld as constitutional in July by the U.S. Supreme Court. It is aimed mainly at the University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City, Kan.

It would prevent the use of public funds in abortions and assisting with abortions, and it would prohibit public employees from participating in abortions.

The measure has 14 sponsors led by Sen. Don Montgomery, R-Sabetha. Six of the Senate committee's 11 members are sponsors, including its chairman, Sen. Ed Reilly, R-Leavenworth, who is Catholic and whose district contains a large number of Catholic residents.

"I doubt seriously that this bill will be bottled up in committee here," Reilly said, acknowledging the significant support for the measure in the committee.

However, the measure may face an uncertain future even if the committee and the full Senate approve it. The chairwoman of the House Federal and State Affairs Committee, Rep. Ginger Barr, R-Auburn, opposes the bill, and the House previously has rejected similar proposals as amendments to other measures.

"It's a very bipartisan opposition to the bill," said Rep. Kathleen Sebelius, D-Topeka, a strong abortion rights advocate and the ranking minority member on the House committee. "This has never been greeted with much enthusiasm in the House, and I don't see that changing."

The hearing on the bill Thursday had elements similar to hearings on abortion legislation in recent years.

About 75 spectators and a contingent of reporters initially packed the stuffy hearing room in which Reilly's committee meets, one of the smallest hearing rooms in the Statehouse. Many of them wore bright red and blue stickers that proclaimed their opposition to abortion.

During the hearing, a class of about 15 uniformed students from the all-boys St. Marys Academy in St. Marys worked its way into the room to observe and take notes. St. Marys is a conservative Catholic community of about 1,600 people, 25 or so miles northwest of Topeka.

Much of the testimony contained standard abortion-hearing rhetoric as well.

For example, Adele Hughey, executive director of the Comprehensive Health for Women clinic in Overland Park, cited the cases of three women who wanted to abort severely malformed fetuses who were unlikely to live long outside the womb.

"Please listen to the real-world situations of women and their families who never thought they would be in a position to need an abortion," she said. "On behalf of the families of Kansas who are daily facing these kinds of difficult and personal decisions, I plead with you to put yourself in their shoes and not take this step backward."

On the other side of the issue, anti-abortion activists urged the committee to prevent "baby killing." Pat Goodson, lobbyist for Right to Life of Kansas Inc., described the Med Center as a training ground for "future abortionists" and said Kansas had become "an abortion mecca."

"It is not a legitimate function of government to fund or promote the dismemberment of our unborn children," said Cynthia Patton, a lobbyist for Kansans for Life.

Kansas has one of the nation's most liberal abortion laws, requiring only that a woman obtain the consent of a physician and have the abortion performed in a licensed medical facility. It is virtually abortion on demand.

However, state law does prohibit the use of state funds to directly pay for women's abortions. The bill would go further by prohibiting the use of public facilities and personnel.

Gov. Mike Hayden has proposed retracting abortions after the first 22 weeks of pregnancy and requiring a girl under 16 to notify a parent before she has an abortion. However, he has not proposed ending abortions at the Med Center.

"I think that's bad public policy," Barr said of the Senate bill. "Most people agree you should be able to have an abortion in cases of rape or incest. Why would you ban it from a public facility? Most people I've talked to want to make sure that women who have an abortion have good medical care."

Goodson replied, "They are being done at a public facility which belongs to the people of this state."

The dean of the KU School of Medicine, Martin Pernoll, said the bill could endanger the school's educational efforts.

Some of the abortions performed there are done because of complicated medical conditions, he said. Thus, the medical students there will have no exposure to treating those kinds of cases if the bill passes, he said.

signs will be placed in Fairchild Hall and Leasure Hall. Emergency lights will be put in Fairchild, Denison, Cardwell Hall and Shellenberger Hall.

Buildings are given priority by considering how many people use the building, what type of activities the area handles and the size and age of the building, said John Lambert, director of public safety.

Wooden structures, such as Fairchild, and buildings housing chemicals are considered to be of higher risk and receive precedence, Lambert said.

ing. We have it rented out at competitive rates, and it is a good investment," said Mel Borst, a landlord. Borst said his worst fear is lives will be lost in Manhattan due to a lack of safety precautions.

The committee decided to have another meeting before presenting a final draft to the City Council on Feb. 27. The meeting is tentatively set for Feb. 21. The purpose of this meeting will be to hear the comments of the citizen's advisory committee.

"The underlying purpose is to provide safe and adequate housing for everyone including students," Conduff said.

What this could mean to K-State students is higher rent and less housing, landlords said.

"It is going to hurt the students, it will raise their rents," Schrum said. "I don't think they realize what they're doing," said Jerome Dieker, landlord. "There will be such an abundance of people looking for housing that Junction City will thank us."

All campus buildings are property of the state, which is self-insured. If fire destroyed a building, the state would have no funds for reconstruction or property damage, Garvin said.

Nichols Hall was gutted by a fire in 1968. Capital funding was diverted from the Holton Hall and Dickens Hall remodeling projects to reconstruct Nichols, he said.

In the case of an accidental fire, the state would not accept liability, Garvin said.

Code violations or negligence on behalf of the state would be the only grounds for a liability suit against the state, said University Attorney Richard Seaton.

According to the Proposed Long Range Building Request, the intent of the plan is ultimately to provide fire safety devices for all campus buildings.

As the buildings are remodeled they are brought up to code, Garvin said.

Lambert said annunciator boards will be installed as safety improvements are made.

For local and national news, read the Collegian

"Fire alarms alert the people, they don't put the fire out," he said. "In the older buildings this could be a problem."

The funding for fire and life safety equipment is allocated by the Kansas Board of Regents through a special maintenance request, Garvin said.

"We recover a lot of items," she said.

Herrman said the University police have also had some success in recovering stolen property.

"Here on campus we cleared 20 auto burglaries and recovered quite a bit of property," he said.

But Herrman also said stolen property is often taken out of town and given away or sold.

"In 1989 we arrested five young people out of Topeka for auto burglaries," he said. "We arrested three out of Junction City and we've been working on some car thefts and burglaries out of Emporia."

University police and the Riley County Police Department often work together to solve thefts, Herrman said.

"Many of our crimes and Riley County's crimes are committed by the same people," he said. "(In 1989), through Riley County's investigators and some information that came from an informant, we put some money together and purchased some stolen property from a guy and then interviewed him. Consequently, he has been found guilty of burglarizing several vehicles here on campus."

Mandela released after 27 years

By The Associated Press

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — Nelson Mandela walked through a prison gate to freedom Sunday, setting off joyous celebrations and violent clashes as blacks nationwide welcomed their leader back from 27 years in jail.

"Comrades and fellow South Africans, I greet you all in the name of peace, democracy and freedom for all," Mandela told tens of thousands of cheering supporters who thronged outside City Hall, many getting their first look at the African National Congress leader.

"I stand here before you not as a prophet, but as a humble servant of you the people."

Within an hour of the release, as Mandela's motorcade arrived at City Hall, violence broke out. First aid workers and journalists said one person was killed and more than 100 people injured when riot police fired shotguns after groups of black youths smashed shop windows in the city center.

Some youths retaliated by hurling bottles at the officers. Hundreds of terrified people, waiting to hear Mandela, ran for cover as police fired blasts of shotgun pellets.

Clashes between police and celebrating blacks were reported in at least two other areas, while in Johannesburg thousands of young blacks received an escort from traffic police as they ran triumphantly through the city. Columns of cheering activists jogged through Durban and other cities.

"We have waited too long for our freedom," Mandela told the crowd. He said that until the proper climate was created for peaceful negotiations, the armed struggle was still a policy of the ANC.

"The factors that (caused the need for armed struggle) exist today,"

“

Comrades and fellow South Africans, I greet you all in the name of peace, democracy and freedom for all. I stand here before you not as a prophet, but as a humble servant of you the people.

—Nelson Mandela

Mandela said. "We have no options but to continue."

"We express the hope that a climate conducive to a negotiated settlement would be created."

Mandela spoke of "my long and lonely years in prison."

"I am content that your pain and suffering was far greater than my own," he said, adding that he would make further statements after consulting his ANC comrades.

"There must be an end to white monopoly of political power and a fundamental restructuring of our political and economic systems to ensure that the inequalities of apartheid are addressed," he said.

The ANC leader called President F.W. de Klerk a man of integrity, and called on the white community to "join us in the safety of a new South Africa. The freedom movement is a political home for you, too."

Mandela, jailed since 1962 for helping plan the African National Congress' anti-government guerrilla campaign, was greeted by a thunderous cheer when he and his wife, Winnie, walked hand in hand through the gateway of Victor Verster Prison in Paarl, 35 miles from Cape Town.

The Mandelas gave clenched-fist salutes to the hundreds of supporters who had waited for hours outside, many of them waving green, gold and black ANC flags.

Mandela, dressed in a dark suit and tie, appeared solemn and dignified as he and his wife walked to a white BMW sedan and climbed in. He broke into a broad smile as the car set off toward Cape Town in a police-escorted motorcade.

Scores of policemen stood guard, and a small army of photographers and television crews from across the world took the first pictures of Mandela as a free man.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson, speaking at a church service outside Cape Town shortly before Mandela was released, commended the South African government for making a courageous step but said the pillars of apartheid remain in place.

De Klerk, who spoke at length Saturday on Mandela's release, stayed out of the public eye Sunday. Anton Pretorius, a de Klerk spokesman, said the president planned to comment on Mandela's release later in the week.

Government television, however, broadcast live Mandela's exit from prison and later showed most of the ANC leader's speech.

Mandela's speech was delayed an hour by the violence. As the clashes erupted, some anti-apartheid leaders told the crowd to disperse, but many remained to hear Mandela's voice for the first time in nearly three decades. Army units equipped with tear gas were deployed nearby, and police helicopters flew overhead.

Fire destroys house, contents; no injuries reported

By Robert Short
Special Projects Editor

A fire destroyed a two-bedroom mobile home and its contents Sunday night in the northeast corner of Frank's Mobile Home Park, 130 McCall Road. No one was injured in the 11 p.m. blaze in east Manhattan.

The owner of the home, Elsa Morgan, and her children were at home at the time of the fire, said Bill Smith, fire chief of the Manhattan Fire Department. They were able to escape and report the fire without injury.

Smith said fire and smoke were coming from the windows on the north side of the home when firefighters arrived.

The home was a total loss, he said. "The inside is pretty well gutted," Smith said. "Most of the contents were lost due to the intense heat and smoke."

Firefighters were able to bring the fire under control in about 30 minutes. An exhaust fan was used remove smoke from the house as fire officials began investigating the cause of the blaze.

Smith said burn patterns suggest the fire began in the water heater compartment located near the back of the trailer.

"Tentatively, that is where we are pinpointing (the source of the fire)," he said.

Fire officials will continue their investigation of the fire today, Smith said.

It is not uncommon for fires to originate in the furnace and water heater compartments of mobile homes, especially in the winter, he said.

Firefighters received the report of a fire at 11:06 p.m. The home was located in lot 1A of the park.

Firefighters investigate the cause of a fire that destroyed a mobile home in east Manhattan Sunday evening. No one was injured in the 11 p.m. blaze. Investigators estimate the damage of the trailer to be a total loss. Fire and smoke were visible from the north side of the home at 130 McCall Road when firefighters arrived.

Survey to study views on condoms

By Lori Stauffer
Collegian Reporter

Students will soon be asked whether they think condoms should be made available through dispensing machines on campus.

Cindy Burke, director of health education and promotion for Lafene Student Health Center, said a survey will be conducted asking that question Feb. 26 through March 2 during Condom Awareness Week.

February is National Condom Awareness Month. Although it is the 10th year the month has been recognized nationally, it is the first year K-State will actively participate in the event, Burke said. Activities are being planned for the last week of February to educate students about condoms.

Burke said her role educating students has earned her the name Condom Queen and Rubber Maid, as she has distributed free condoms to various living groups.

She said free condoms are probably what draw the students to her presentations, but she said she hopes they leave with more knowledge than they had when they arrived.

"If all they hear is that every time they have sex they should use a condom, that's OK. They've heard something," Burke said.

Burke has given lectures on sexually transmitted diseases, pregnancy, women's health issues and sex education. As a general rule, she said, they have been well received. Burke said her presentations on birth control have been widely received by males. She said females are usually more reluctant to attend because they are either too embarrassed or do not believe they need the birth control.

Males, on the other hand, haven't been educated as much as females concerning birth control and really don't know that much about it, Burke said.

"They ask questions and really get involved," she said.

The numbers at the presentations increase each year, added Burke.

Even with AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases in the news, Burke said it is not necessarily true that students are practicing safe sex more than before. Students are "aware, yes; responsible, no," she said.

"The majority have the attitude that 'It's not going to happen to me. It will happen to someone else,'" Burke said. "This is true for pregnancies and STDs, as well as AIDS."

She predicted that within five years, everyone will know someone who has contracted the AIDS virus.

"Students need to be aware that we don't live in an isolated world here at K-State," Burke said about the risks students take with AIDS. "It's here."

It has been reported that one of every 500 persons carries the AIDS virus, she said.

"It is possible that there are 40 (K-State) students infected with AIDS and not experiencing any of the symptoms. And, they may be spreading it among others and not even

Researchers examine waste

Engineers study means to eliminate hazardous material

By Bryan Ackley
Science Reporter

Some K-State engineers have spent the past year working with researchers from six other universities to develop and improve methods of identifying and eliminating hazardous waste.

The researchers' efforts are coordinated by Larry Erickson, professor of chemical engineering and director of the Hazardous Substance Research Center for Environmental Protection Agency Regions 7 & 8.

Ten states are included in the two regions: Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, Iowa, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, Montana, South Dakota and North Dakota.

The EPA established the seven-university consortium that comprises the center last February, and has since provided the center with funding in the amount of $2 million, Erickson said.

The agency plans to continue providing the center with funding in the amount of $1 million per year, he said.

About 20 percent of the EPA-provided funding is used to cover the center's administrative expenses. The remainder of the funding supports the researchers' efforts, he said.

The center facilitates communication among researchers, industry and the public, Erickson said.

"Through personal visits, (the center's) newsletter, telephone calls and direct mailings, efforts have been made to emphasize inclusiveness and the idea of 'working together for a better environment,'" Erickson wrote in the center's 1989 annual report.

"I'm very pleased with the progress we're making," he said.

According to the report, the center has undertaken research aimed at combating hazardous waste problems within the 10-state area.

Researchers have targeted several problems for in-depth study:

- Soil and water contamination caused by heavy metals such as cadmium, chromium, copper, lead and zinc, which are commonly associated with mining wastes and other industrial activities.

- Groundwater contamination caused by a variety of sources, which include pesticides and wood preservatives.

- Development of incineration, biodegradation and immobilization technology, which could render wastes nonhazardous before they are released into the environment.

- Development of simplified, inexpensive methods for analyzing contaminated soil.

- Hazardous waste minimization.

- Determination of the amount of hazardous substances released into the atmosphere.

- Determination of what are safe concentration levels of hazardous substances in soil and water.

Professor suggests venting for removing contaminants

By Bryan Ackley
Science Reporter

A K-State professor is trying to take an old idea and turn it into an effective means of cleaning up the environment.

The idea involves removing contaminants from soil by means of a process called venting, said Larry Glasgow, professor of chemical engineering.

"Venting is being practiced, but it's not really being applied systematically," he said. "It's been kind of hit and miss, but it has been effective."

To remove contaminants by venting, air is injected into a contaminated portion of soil and forced to move through pores, or the spaces between soil particles, he said.

The injected air forces contaminant vapors in the pores to flow toward a vacuum, which sucks the contaminants out of the soil, he said.

Once collected by the vacuum, the injected air is decontaminated by being run through a bed of activated carbon, Glasgow said.

"When we get the contaminated air out of the soil, we don't want to put it back into the atmosphere," he said.

By studying computer-simulated models, Glasgow said he may be able to determine the gas flow patterns of various venting arrangements, which could indicate the optimum locations in which to inject and withdraw air in any given soil contamination situation.

"We're hoping to be able to identify particular conditions of air injection and withdrawal that would most effect removal of soil contaminants," he said. "If this can be done on a computer, it will be much easier."

Glasgow's research is one of many projects funded by the Hazardous Substance Research Center for U.S. Environmental Protection Agency Regions 7 and 8.

He and other K-State engineers are working with researchers from six other universities within the regions' 10-state area to develop and improve methods of managing hazardous waste.

Venting is an "in situ" soil treatment process, which means the objective is to correct for the damage without digging up the contaminants.

Earthquake hits Japan

TOKYO (AP) — A strong earthquake hit the Pacific coast of northeastern Japan early Monday morning, but there were no immediate reports of casualties or damage, police and the nation's meteorological agency said.

There also were no tsunami — huge waves that are triggered by undersea disturbances such as earthquakes or volcanic activity, the Central Meteorological Agency said.

The agency said the earthquake had a preliminary reading of 5.5 on the Richter scale, a gauge of the energy released by an earthquake. Each increase of one number means the ground motion is 10 times greater.

A quake of the magnitude of 5 is considered "very strong," and one of 6 is capable of widespread damage if it occurs in a populated area.

The tremor struck at 2:46 a.m. and was centered 24 miles under the seabed off the coast of Ibaraki prefecture, the meteorological agency said.

Six men escape from prison

JOLIET, Ill. (AP) — Six convicts, including three murderers, escaped from a maximum-security prison early Sunday, apparently by cutting through metal bars, officials said. One was captured later in the day.

The escapees, who had been in segregation cells at the Joliet Correctional Center because of disciplinary problems, were considered extremely dangerous, authorities said. Most were in their 20s.

Tommy Munoz was captured shortly after 5:30 p.m. at his cousin's Chicago home by law enforcement officers who'd staked it out, said state Department of Corrections spokesman Nic Howell. Munoz, 22, was serving a sentence for narcotics violations and intimidation.

About 100 corrections officers specially trained to deal with escapes assisted state police and local law enforcement officers in the hunt.

A search for the escapees with dogs and an airplane was called off earlier because they had apparently split up, said state Trooper Thomas Miller.

The prisoners escaped from segregation cells, where they were kept for disciplinary problems, Howell said. Four of the inmates were doubled up in cells and the other two were in cells alone.

The inmates had to cut through bars on the cells, break a window, cut through bars outside the window and cross a fence to get away, Howell said.

Girlfriend reports threats

OLATHE (AP) — A man killed by two shotgun blasts outside an Olathe house had received death threats late last year, his girlfriend said.

Bobbi Bolton, who lived with Charles W. Howell and was inside the house Thursday when he was killed, said she told Olathe police last week that Howell had filed a complaint with Kansas City, Mo., police about the threats.

Kansas City police Saturday said they could not confirm that the complaint had been filed. A spokesman for the Metro Squad, which assembled Saturday to investigate the killing of Howell, declined to comment about Bolton's statement.

Group distributes 'living wills'

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — A Kansas City group is getting a big response for its efforts to draw up "living wills," documents to alleviate difficult deathbed decisions and encourage patient autonomy, the group says.

Living wills allow patients to indicate what life-prolonging treatments they do not wish to undergo if they are terminally ill.

The Ethics Committee Consortium, consisting of 56 local hospitals and nursing homes, has joined the Midwest Bioethics Center and the Kansas City Metropolitan Bar Association in distributing more than 35,000 living will documents over the last several months.

Joan Killion, coordinator for the Midwest Bioethics Center's living will project, said the response has been so great the center now receives hundreds of calls every week.

"There has been such a positive reaction that we now are considering developing it into a statewide project," she said.

Barbara Bush to visit Salina

First Lady Barbara Bush will speak in Salina Tuesday at the Chamber of Commerce's annual meeting.

"She is a very popular lady; she is very much in demand," said Don Wiser, vice president of the Chamber.

The Chamber's annual meetings have often featured famous people, Wiser said, including former presidents Ronald Reagan and Gerald Ford.

"We, in the past, have been noted for having this kind of caliber of personality," Wiser said.

Wiser said Bush's speech will cover the general experiences of her first year in the White House and her responsibilities.

Bush will arrive in Salina Tuesday morning for the noon meeting in the Arena of the Bicentennial Center, he said.

Political philosopher to speak

Political philosopher Susan Moller Okin will deliver a lecture titled "Rethinking the Dichotomy of Public and Private" as part of the University Lectures in the Humanities series.

Okin, a professor of politics at Brandeis University, will speak at 3:30 p.m. Thursday in K-State Union 213. She also will speak on "Justice and Gender" at 7:30 p.m. that day in Eisenhower 212.

Okin published the book, "Justice, Gender and the Family," a feminist critique of contemporary political theory which argues for concrete changes in society's laws, public policy and social institutions.

The lecture series is sponsored by the departments of English, history, modern languages and philosophy, the College of Arts and Sciences and the Graduate School. Additional funding was provided by the Division of Women's Studies.

Judging team places third

The K-State livestock judging team won third place at the National Western Livestock Judging Contest in Denver.

Students representing 28 universities from across the United States competed in judging beef, hogs and sheep at the National Western competition. The contest tests the students' abilities in judging livestock. Out of a possible 5,000 points, K-State had a total of 4,440.

Team members were Kendall Lock, Corey Krehbiel, Brian Anderson, Clay Dalquest and Dan Eggar, all juniors in animal sciences and industries. Calvin Drake, professor of animal sciences and industry, was the team's coach.

South Africa still faces problems with racism

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Once the euphoria over Nelson Mandela's release dies down, South Africa will still face the enormous challenge of ending its centuries-old racial divisions and building a new nation.

Black and white leaders say a major era in the country's history is coming to an end with the impending demise of white-minority rule. But the future is foreboding, they warn, with many obstacles and the threat of conflict ahead.

South Africans must peacefully solve the country's problems and find a way to live together in equality after 40 years of apartheid, leaders say. But the white government and its opponents appear to be far apart, with whites insisting on a special role in the future despite black objections. "Now there can be no going back. Irreversibly, South Africa has been placed on the path to its new future," The Sunday Times said in an editorial reflecting the views of a growing number of South Africans.

While the search for peace is likely to be long and difficult, changes that would have been unthinkable even a year or two ago are already taking place.

President F.W. de Klerk's decision to free Mandela and end bans on black opposition groups after years of armed conflict stunned many whites and blacks. He pledged to find a new dispensation that would end the exclusion of the country's 28 million blacks from political power.

De Klerk says he opposes black majority rule and that a new constitution must include protection for "group rights" to ensure whites are not swamped in a future democratic state. The government says it will also retain, for now, such apartheid legislation as laws segregating residential districts.

While the government declines to outline its position in talks on a future constitution, governing National Party officials say they favor splitting the country into a series of racially based, semi-independent cantons or counties.

The cantons would be united under a federation that would oversee economic cooperation and other tempting to force an election to oust the government. Political observers say de Klerk's white support is uncertain and he has to move quickly and decisively.

Many whites looked worried or scared as they watched cheering and singing blacks surging through parts of central Johannesburg on Saturday after Mandela's release date was announced.

A handful of blacks taunted whites, yelling "Freedom is coming! Whites get out!" A few furious whites lashed out, hurling bottles and insults at the blacks.

Government leaders are worried about a violent reaction by extreme right-wingers, and security officials are braced for terrorism. Some political analysts have raised the possibility of a military coup, but the government insists it has the full support of the defense forces.

The ANC and other anti-apartheid groups face major divisions. The ANC is split between moderates and hard-liners favoring a military campaign, and some black groups oppose any negotiations with the white government.

Mandela faces the challenge of trying to organize a broad coalition to present a united front to both the government and to more militant black groups. Mandela's task is likely to be easier than de Klerk's since many blacks regard him as their leader.

Despite the enormous challenges, many whites and blacks appear hopeful they can solve their differences peacefully and find a way to live together without being tied down by the past.

Analysis

national issues.

Critics reject such plans as "apartheid in another guise" and the ANC and other opposition groups say they will accept nothing less than total democracy.

Mandela has indicated he will not bend on his insistence on equal rights. "We must work toward a common destiny, and that can only be achieved through a non-racial society and not one in which whites continue to demand special political treatment," Mandela was quoted as saying by the South African Press Association.

The 5 million whites in South Africa control the economy, and there is a huge gulf between the prosperity of most whites and the bleak poverty of the great majority of blacks.

But while de Klerk and Mandela attempt to find a peaceful solution, there are many whites and blacks who will oppose any compromise and insist on total power for their side alone.

Many whites are unhappy about the steps de Klerk has taken, and the opposition Conservative Party is at-

Faction leaves Party

By The Associated Press

SOFIA, Bulgaria — A Communist Party faction impatient with the pace of reform broke away Sunday and formed its own party.

The Alternative Socialist Party, in its founding declaration, called for private enterprise and limited government control of the economy.

The official BTA news agency reported that as many as 600 people joined the new party.

"The Alternative Socialist Party will consider socialism not as a social system but as an inevitable trend in the development of civilization," said the declaration, signed by 30 intellectuals who left the Communist Party.

The new party was formed from the Alternative Socialist Organization during a meeting to consider whether or not to remain in the mainstream of the ruling Communist Party.

According to the declaration, read at the conference by Nikolai Vassilev, the leader of the Alternative Socialist Organization, the new party will seek allies among the radical and reform forces of the Bulgarian Communist Party, the Agrarian Party, the Social-Democratic Party and all democratic movements in the country, BTA reported.

The meeting came less than two weeks after a key Communist Party Congress that chose moderate reformer Alexander Lilov as party chief and sought to present a more progressive image.

The party under Lilov's predecessor Petar Mladenov, who took over from longtime hard-line leader Todor Zhivkov in November, had made some moves toward reform, including renouncing its constitutionally guaranteed leading role.

During the four-day party congress, Lilov and other top officials said the party had parted with Stalinism and was embarking on a road of "socialist democracy."

Researchers benefit from new supercomputer

By Angie Huff
Collegian Reporter

The supercomputer in Nichols Hall is a great benefit to researchers, said Warren White, assistant professor in mechanical engineering.

"The computer has been a tremendous addition to the research informational structure of the campus," White said.

The computer, which was installed last semester, is a SCS40 made by Scientific Computer Systems Corporation and costs $700,000.

A supercomputer is a machine that processes 100 million floating points per second and the computer which was installed in Nichols is a Cray-compatible machine which is capable of processing 40 million points per second, said Virgil Wallentine, head of the computing and information sciences department.

Cray is the name of a company which has become synonymous with this type of processing, and the computer installed in Nichols logically operates like a Cray machine does, Wallentine said.

"Fundamentally it is what we call a vector machine," Wallentine said. "The machine is good at computing sets of multiple data items. If a problem can be described in terms of vectors or matrices, then it is capable of parallel computing, Wallentine said.

For example, a problem involving two vectors with 10 elements in each vector can be computed in one instructional cycle because of parallel computing. The same problem on a traditional machine would take 10 instructional cycles to complete. The supercomputer, in this case, is 10 times as fast, Wallentine said.

The installation was made possible through a combination of donations, Wallentine said. Scientific Computer Systems Corporation donated the equipment and Xerox donated money.

The University paid $30,000 for the computer's installation and shipping, Wallentine said.

Some applications the mini-supercomputer is good at include large physics problems, large engineering problems, fractal problems, numerical analysis in mathematics and large statistical problems.

Cargill

Cargill is looking for chemical, mechanical, agricultural and milling-science engineers who are leaders interested in significant managerial jobs. We offer entry-level engineering positions that blend engineering expertise, production management and supervision.

Cargill is a privately held international agricultural marketing and industrial processing company. Our engineers become managers of production departments or engineering projects, with opportunities to become operations managers of production facilities. There is growth potential in a number of operating divisions for engineers with integrity, professionalism and creativity.

Cargill will be on campus:

- Feb. 15
Scott Montgomery will conduct on-campus interviews for milling-science majors.
- Feb. 21
Tony Lippert and Jeff Stanley will conduct on-campus interviews for all other engineering majors.

Soviet food shortages result of red tape

The globe is warming, and we face the inevitable consequences of the greenhouse effect, but the world can sigh with relief, at last there is one ray of hope—a multiple-party system in the Soviet Union.

Since 1917, the world has feared the Soviet Union and battled the fear of a communist takeover. After decades of negotiations and hopelessness, the good shall prevail—evil will not.

Last week, Soviet leaders admitted defeat, saying they could no longer suppress party competition. Their bold declaration will truly make a significant impact on the Soviet Union and other countries of the world. Allowing multi-party politics is a profound step in perhaps achieving a moment of world peace. However, this declaration, which has sent freedom-seekers singing, has more holes in it than a minnow bucket.

Allowing party competition will not solve the problems of the Soviet people or cure ailments that have afflicted the nation for more than 70 years. In the midst of this political breakthrough, the average citizen is being deprived of food and supplies. Meat and most other staples are still strictly rationed in the Soviet Union. No matter which party rules, until the government can effectively control the cost and distribution of food and supplies, the Soviet Union will never reach democracy or attain any sense of peace or well-being for its citizens.

According to official reports published Friday, there will be a drastic cutback in meat production because the Soviet Union doesn't have enough grain to feed its cattle. The chairman of the state commission for food and procurement, Vladimir Nikitin, told Pravda that meat deliveries must be drastically cut. The cuts must be made because the country can't afford to purchase any more grain, he said. News sources indicate many problems caused the cutback, including fuel shortages and transportation problems.

Soviets spent an estimated $36 million last year on grain imports. Yet cattle are still starving, and so are citizens. This new party competition is another front to blind the outside world to the basic problems that still plague the nation.

Audra Dietz

COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

The communist party doesn't need to worry about competition. Any challengers will starve to death before they can run for office. Allowing multi-party competition will not loosen the communist grip on the average Soviet citizen. The Soviet government is still hoarding food and basic survival supplies. Depriving citizens of food, fuel and supplies has caused the recent uprisings against the government in many republics, including the Ukraine and Russia. According to news service reports, on the day Nikitin gave his report on the country's economic status, local television reporters found a warehouse, a so called "empty warehouse" stashing "scarce" imported food. Now, Mr. Gorbachev, who was planning on eating all that scarce food?

Last year, the Soviets reported a harvest of 211 million tons of grain—not too shabby. But these supplies are gone. Wire reports indicate state grain allotments for this year fell to 59 tons, the lowest supply since 1984.

Officials say the country can't afford to import foreign grain. If the Soviets are really that hard up, I vote we give them some of our grain surplus. It's not like we're short on food. The number of American farmers is dropping because the U.S. government can't export grain, which would allow the domestic market price to rise. This is an age-old complaint, but our farmers are desperate. Farmers aren't getting paid anyway, and the current government deficiency payments don't even cover production costs. Any attempt to lift the surplus burden would allow farmers some relief. However, with such a strong-willed leader as our dear Mr. Bush, such a noble gesture might make him appear a spineless fool.

Grain shortages and the lack of food and fuel haven't stopped true love in the communist block. Susan Eisenhower, granddaughter of late President Dwight D. Eisenhower, married Soviet scientist Roald Sagdeyev last week. Ahh... across the sea, they met in New York at a conference on Soviet-American relations. Imagine that. I wonder at what point they reached their summit. I suppose the talks were so stimulating they had nothing else to do. After hours of negotiations, they decided to wed. Lust is an international language.

Before Gorbachev dies of a mysterious disease, the Soviets had better get a handle on their poor economic status. While the government's package appears new and bright, a hungry, repressed society still remains inside.

Mandela's new freedom not end of apartheid

Nelson Mandela is free at last.

After 27 years, the world's most famous political prisoner was released by South African President F.W. de Klerk on Sunday. On the same day, Mandela made his first public speech to a large crowd of supporters waving the green, yellow and black-colored flags of the African National Congress. This is a scene that was inconceivable just a few weeks ago.

Mandela is the symbol of the struggle of blacks against the white minority government and the system of apartheid. Mandela selflessly put the cause of freedom for all the people of South Africa above his own.

Since 1985, the government agreed to release him if he renounced violence. In recent weeks, Mandela has been the key to negotiations, refusing to leave until certain conditions were met. Because of public pressure from inside and outside the country, he turned the tables on his captors.

The release of Mandela is being heralded as a great step forward for the repressive South African government. But it is only a first step.

Mandela stepped out into a society even more repressive than the one he left in 1962. The society is so repressive it is illegal to possess any of his writings.

Mandela has convinced some in the government he can bring a peaceful change to South Africa. The white minority is starting to realize they can no longer maintain their privileged positions in government and society. They can join in partnership with the blacks, or they can fight a civil war that will wipe out the country. Some realize the winner of that war won't have much of a country left in which to live.

The awareness and support of the American people and the economic sanctions imposed on South Africa did have an effect on this change. But let us not forget this is just a small, mostly symbolic step.

The dismantling of apartheid has not yet happened. The pressure that has worked in getting these recent concessions should be kept up to inspire more change. A free Mandela is only part of the goal. Finally, we need a free South Africa.

LETTERS

Definition wrong

Editor,

Mr. Seabourn, I would like to thank you for the history and current events lesson you gave us in your column. The student body here at K-State usually has to pay for the acquisition of such knowledge. But Brad, if I may call you that, you have somehow written another column that misses the nail completely. You have a truly special knack for that. The major pitfall of your otherwise brilliant column was the assumption that we, as ignorant readers, already knew the definition of the word "racism," or at least your interpretation of it.

Oh sure, Brad, I know. Everyone knows the meaning of racism. But evidently I do not, at least not in the context you use it.

The definition of racism that I understand is prejudice with the power to impose that prejudice on the individuals affected to their harm. A racial joke is not racism, and should not cost anyone a job. Come on now, Brad, have you ever told a Polish or Mexican joke, or at least laughed at one? Then are you and whoever else a racist?

Your weakest example was your assertion that black athletes are used and then thrown away, with no education, from a predominantly "white educational system." These select few individuals who, through God, hard work or both, merit scholarships are receiving the rare opportunity of a free education. As individuals they can use that any way they choose. It is their opportunity to use or lose. I will not argue that in some ways the system does use athletes, but in other ways the system also uses you and me. Do you think that anyone in the "largely white educational system" cares if any of the other students gets an education? No, they don't. It is our responsibility to either get an education and graduate or not and move on. The athletes have the same choice.

The term you should have used is prejudice. The way I understand prejudice, it is to prejudice a person by something about them. Prejudice is not only color-related, it can be based on height, weight, hair color, etc.

In our society the term prejudice immediately takes on racial connotations, or white hatred of blacks or other minorities. The fact is that prejudice is a two-way street. Yes, Brad, there is black hatred of whites also. But because blacks are the minority, it is pictured as the little boy picking on the big bully. The little boy can't actually hurt the bully, so just ignore it. But to understand and help the whole situation you can't ignore it.

To get back to your college athletics example, look at the Georgetown University basketball program. The coach is John Thompson, a black man. Coach Thompson, by his choosing, recruits almost only black athletes for his team. Is he a racist because he mainly recruits black players to a predominantly white school? I haven't heard anything in the papers about that, but think about it.

My basic point is, don't confuse racism with prejudice. Also understand that prejudice occurs between people of all races. How we solve this problem is beyond me. Maybe the great thinker Brad Seabourn can solve the problem and cure America and the whole world of prejudice and racism.

Until then people will continue to harbor prejudices against others not like them, whether it be based on race, religion, height, weight, etc. I doubt the problem will ever be solved, especially when we ignore parts of it.

Land threatened

Editor,

In the past I have written about the impact of Fort Riley's land expansion on surrounding areas. For example, the uprooting of cemeteries, the increase of property taxes on the remaining land areas, and the negative impact economically on the surrounding smaller communities.

One problem that I have not yet heard raised is the great loss of wildlife areas that could result from the Fort's land expansion.

There are many thousands of acres of land surrounding Milford Lake that are owned by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and leased to the State of Kansas Wildlife and Parks Department. These precious wildlife areas could be lost to the people of Kansas if the U.S. Army expands Fort Riley by terminating the leases to Kansas.

I recently obtained copies of the lease documents from the U.S. government to the state of Kansas associated with these wildlife areas. I found it most interesting that many of these leases terminate in May of 1991.

These areas not only provide shelter for many types of wildlife, but provide some of the best hunting and fishing for the people of Kansas. If you look at a map of these areas, or take the time to drive through them, you will begin to appreciate more their importance to our community.

Several weeks ago I wrote to Robert Meinen, Secretary of the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks, and asked him to take every possible step to protect these areas for the people of Kansas. I urged him to testify in favor of Kansas House resolution No. 6005.

If you are concerned about the permanent loss of these areas to the people of Kansas, write to Secretary Meinen and urge him to work for a long-term extension of these leases.

If you would like more information on these wildlife areas, I am sure Meinen's office can provide that additional information. In addition, you could write to the members of the Kansas Wildlife and Parks Commission who have the same address as Secretary Meinen.

As a young boy I used to wander through the wetlands, woods and hills that are now threatened. This area of Kansas has magnificent beauty that must be preserved for our children. It is a public trust.

Please express your concerns regarding these wildlife areas to your public officials.

University offers areas for study

By Clinton Wolf
Collegian Reporter

Despite a shortage of available space on campus, administrators of many departments have allotted space for student study areas.

Virginia Moxley, associate dean of academic affairs said it is important for students with jobs and leadership roles to have areas which are accessible, quiet and conducive to study.

Justin Hall has two such areas. "One thing we like to help students with is managing their time," Moxley said. "We do our best to accommodate students who are trying to study."

The Hoffman Lounge inside Justin's main entrance has reading chairs and tables for individual and group studying to meet this goal, Moxley said. Reference materials and transparent tape are provided, she said.

"We do occasionally use (Hoffman Lounge) for lectures when we absolutely cannot get a classroom," Moxley said.

The other study area is the interdepartmental library and resource room in Justin 245.

Seaton Hall offers several study areas 24 hours a day, seven days a week, said William Jahnke, assistant dean of the college of architecture and design.

"There are many classrooms which are almost always open for studying," Jahnke said.

The Weigel Library of Architecture and Design is located in Seaton. In addition, a student lounge is located in Seaton 106F, Jahnke said. The lounge has tables and chairs for studying and an eating area, Jahnke said.

An engineering study area is located directly beneath the main entrance to Seaton, he said.

Miles McKee, professor of animal sciences and industry, said the Block and Bridle lounge has become a popular study area since it was created as part of Weber Hall remodeling.

The area had been a runway for livestock underneath Weber Arena. The runway was only used about seven days a year before, but now it is used "almost continuously," McKee said.

Because of the shape of the room, the area could only be used for specialized classrooms or for a computer lab, he said.

"It gets a lot more use this way than it would as a classroom," McKee said.

McKee said the lounge allows students to study in a group setting, which is difficult in a library or in residence halls. He said having a study area available in Weber affords students a place to study without walking across campus between classes.

The Department of Chemistry offers two study areas for students, said Herbert Moser, professor of chemistry. The Chemistry Library has recently been expanded to include Willard 101 and 102 and has several study carrels.

Students in chemistry courses are encouraged to use the departmental help room in Willard 223, Moser said.

"They can be in any chemistry course, especially freshman courses, which are larger," he said.

John Riley, assistant director of the College of Agriculture, said three study rooms are available in Waters Hall. The reading room is located in Waters 135, the agricultural economics reference library is in Waters 337, and the horticulture study room is in Waters 223.

"None of these rooms could be used for classrooms," Riley said. "They're too small. In fact, one is a converted office."

Riley said the college keeps recruiting literature and industry magazines in the rooms for students to read.

Robert Hollinger, associate dean of the college of business administration, said the student lounge in Calvin 09 is an important part of space usage there.

"It's very heavily used by students all day long," Hollinger said. "That's a resource we don't want to take away from them."

Hollinger said it would be impossible to use the room as a classroom because it is surrounded by faculty offices.

"We're using all of our space up to capacity here in Calvin," he said.

John Shirley, associate professor of animal sciences and industry, said the library in Call Hall 118 has current industry periodicals and journals, as well as chairs and tables for studying.

"It's pretty well used," Shirley said.

Condom

know it," Burke said.

Although condom advertisements have encouraged people to believe condoms effectively protect against AIDS, Barbara Lewis, health education nurse, said it has never been concretely stated that condoms protect against AIDS or herpes. She said they are, however, the best prevention when combined with a spermicide.

To protect against AIDS and unwanted pregnancy, condoms must be used correctly. According to a pamphlet distributed by Lafene, students should use a condom every time they have sexual intercourse or other acts between partners that involve contact with the penis. Condoms should be stored in a cool, dry place. If the rubber material is sticky or brittle or obviously damaged, it should not be used.

The pamphlet also stresses that if a lubricant is used it should only be water- or silicone-based. Oil-based lubricants, such as those made with petroleum jelly, mineral oil, vegetable oil or cold cream, may damage the condom.

Making condoms available to students leaves some parents and administrators worried that it will leave the impression of college campuses as being one big party. However, Burke said this has not become a reality on campuses where the condoms have been distributed by such methods as dispensing machines.

"If parents knew the percentage of students who are sexually active, they would be welcoming the usage," she said.

In September, Marlatt Hall surprised the campus by selling condoms for 10 cents at the information desk.

Dave Yoder, director of Marlatt, said the decision to make the condoms available came after one of Burke's presentations. He said he and the hall president discussed it and decided to try and sell the condoms.

Yoder said the demand has been sufficient to continue the service.

Venting

nated soil and taking it to a hazardous waste disposal facility, Glasgow said.

"What we want to do is elevate venting to the level of a standard engineering practice," he said, "but there's no component of this process that's radically new."

To determine whether a particular soil contamination situation could be corrected by venting, Glasgow said experts must first discern the extent of the contamination and the depth of the water table nearest to the contaminated soil.

Problems can usually be minimized as long as the contaminants do not get into adjacent groundwater, but no one can ever be certain all the contaminants have been removed from the soil, he said.

"The only way you could know whether you got all the contamination out is if you knew exactly how much contamination there was before venting," Glasgow said.

In many instances, however, soil contamination goes unnoticed or unreported, and groundwater becomes contaminated before any type of correction can be attempted, he said.

Consequently, groundwater contaminated by hazardous waste becomes everyone's problem, Glasgow said.

"We're not talking about something that's esoteric," he said.

100 people had been hurt, and journalists counted 130 injuries. There was no immediate statement from police.

In Johannesburg, hundreds of young blacks, joined by a few whites, ran through downtown streets shouting, "Viva ANC!" after the release. Traffic police patrol cars cleared the way for them.

In Soweto, the sprawling black township outside Johannesburg where Mandela has his home, crowds of supporters danced and sang in celebration, many under umbrellas because of a steady rain.

There were unconfirmed reports that three celebrating blacks in the tribal homeland of Ciskei were shot dead by police. In Inanda, a black township outside Durban, a local journalist said she saw one black killed and five injured when police fired at a celebration.

"Your tireless and heroic sacrifices have made it possible for me to be here today," the 71-year-old Mandela told the crowd. "I therefore place the remaining years of my life in your hands."

The decision to free Mandela was announced Saturday by President F.W. de Klerk, who had met Mandela the previous night. He described the black leader as committed to a peaceful solution.

Computer

Although the actual machine is located in Nichols Hall, it can be accessed by any researcher on campus through a work station on the campus-wide computer network or by any researcher using a terminal on the data switch, Wallentine said.

"(The computer's) fundamental purpose is to support basic research," Wallentine said.

There are 18 researchers using the computer, said Kole Scarbrough, systems manager.

"There will be more people (using the computer) in a wide variety of areas across campus," Wallentine said.

White works with Srinivasan Venkatsubramanian, graduate student in mechanical engineering, researching the phenomenon of transmission line galloping. Transmission line galloping is caused by freezing precipitation adhering to overhead power conductors, White said.

The two researchers are using the computer to test and simulate mathematical models of the phenomenon, he said.

The computer is fast numerically and was built for speed, though it is not what one would call user friendly White said.

"(The computer) is at one end of the computing spectrum and the most user friendly machines are at the other," he said.

'Cats avenge earlier loss to CU, 93-65

By David Svoboda
Sports Reporter

When two teams headed in opposite directions meet, the game is usually only close for fleeting moments. And, when the teams involved are K-State and Colorado, the Wildcats are the team on the roll, and the game is being played in Manhattan, well ... K-State 93, Colorado 65. The win was the 26th in a row for the Wildcats over the Buffaloes in Manhattan, dating back to Jan. 6, 1964. Colorado has now lost 49 consecutive conference road games. More importantly for the home-standing Wildcats, who won their second straight conference contest after dropping three in a row, the win lifted them into fourth place in the Big Eight race. K-State's 4-4 conference mark — to go along with a 14-10 overall record — isn't glittering, but the fourth position is where coach Lon Kruger thinks his team needs to be at season's end for a chance at its fourth straight NCAA tourney trip. If K-State is to make that trip, it needs to take care of business in games it is supposed to win. The contest with Colorado was one of those games.

The fleeting moments that Colorado was able to stay in the game lasted about 4:12 of the first half. It was with 15:48 left in the opening period that Steve Henson hit a 23-foot, three-point bomb from the right wing to lift K-State to a 12-5 lead. The Buffaloes got no closer than eight points the rest of the way. A big reason for the rout was that

K-State shot a season-best 56.7 percent from the field, topping the 56.1 percent notched against both Western Kentucky and Wichita State. "They shot the hell out of the ball," said Colorado coach Tom Miller, who has seen his team drop seven straight since its 79-62 win over K-State in Boulder on Jan. 13. Miller's counterpart, Kruger, said the opening minutes were the key to the relative ease with which the Wildcats won the game. "We got off to a good start," Kruger said. "That's something that's obviously been a concern for a while."

The K-State start — and the final outcome — was keyed by a trio of Wildcat perimeter players who scored

Manhattan High grid stars commit to play for Snyder, Wildcats

By Scott Paske
Sports Reporter

With national college football signing day just six days away, it appears Coach Bill Snyder will supplement his first full recruiting class with some home-grown products. When Manhattan High School's Laird Veatch verbally committed to K-State last week, it raised the number of Indian's who will wear purple next season to four. The Wildcats also receive oral commitments from Roy Stone, Kelly Greene and Jeff Placek earlier.

"These four guys didn't sign because they were home boys," Manhattan High coach Lew Lane said. "K-State got themselves four legitimate major college prospects."

The quartet's announcement to sign letters of intent with K-State is a trend reversal from the previous two seasons. Last year, all-state performer Maurice Benson signed with Missouri as a defensive back. In 1987, Indian all-stars Coby Crowl and Mike Ringgenberg chose the Tigers.

Another Indian, Brett Wallerstedt, played for Arizona State last season after being redshirted in 1988.

"It's really a feather in K-State's cap that they were able to get them to stay," Lane said. "I think Coach Snyder and his staff have made it clear that they want to win, and they intend on doing it with Kansas kids."

"All four players and their parents were really impressed with the coaching staff," Lane said. "I think the staff proved to them that they weren't just talking out from under their hats."

Stone, at 6-foot, 170 pounds, has expressed interest in playing wide receiver for the 'Cats. He has been clocked in the 40-yard dash at 4.45, and was a member of the Indians' 4x100-meter state-qualifying relay team last year.

An All-I-70 League selection at quarterback, Stone threw for over 600 yards and ran for 600 in 1989. Greene, 6-foot-2, 240, is expected to give K-State some depth on the defensive line. Greene, whose father, Bill, is an assistant at MHS, was a two-way starter.

"Kelly is awfully fast for a man that size," Lane said. "I would say his best asset is his lateral speed. He can really burst to the sidelines and keep up with a lot of running backs."

Placek, a 6-foot-2, 210-pound linebacker, co-captained the Indians. He was one of Lane's strongest players, deadlifting 500 pounds as a junior.

"Jeff is a terribly intense individual and a very good football player," Lane said. "He was a two-year starter for us, and served as a real motivator on the field."

Veatch, 6-foot-2, 210, earned second team all-state honors at linebacker. Lane said Veatch, a National Merit Scholar, also looked at Stanford in addition to Kansas and Missouri.

K-State is allowed to sign 25 players during the signing period, which runs Feb. 14-21.

Douglas' knockout of Tyson sparks controversy

'Champion' claims victory in 8th round Title-bout decision makes joke of boxing

By The Associated Press

TOKYO — Buster Douglas, a 29-year-old boxer from Columbus, Ohio, knocked out Mike Tyson on Sunday in a world championship heavyweight bout with no winner, no loser and a "long count" controversy. What a fight! Hours after underdog Douglas' 10th-round knockout, the World Boxing Council and World Boxing Association suspended the result pending investigation of a "long count" protest by Tyson's promoter, Don King.

Tyson, knocked out for the first time in his pro career, said he's still the champion. "I knocked him out before he knocked me out," Tyson said.

Douglas said he's champ: "Just call it a victory for the small man." Douglas' father, former middleweight world contender Bill "Dynamite" Douglas, said: "He pulled the greatest upset in history."

Because of an error by referee Octavio Meyran, Douglas was on the canvas for 12 seconds after Tyson knocked him down in the eighth round. Two rounds later, Douglas knocked out Tyson with a five-punch combination.

"There is no champion before Feb. 20," when the WBC meets in Mexico City to settle the controversy, said WBC president Jose Sulaiman of Mexico.

Sulaiman suggested what course the two governing bodies might take:

"When there are problems, a rematch is absolutely mandatory," he said.

Only the International Boxing Federation, which sanctioned the bout as a championship match, said Douglas is the winner. The IBF, however, isn't recognized by the Japan Boxing Commission.

Douglas' disputed victory has created a wide-open heavyweight division that for three years had been the personal domain of Tyson, who was 37-0 with 33 knockouts.

Tyson was scheduled to defend the title against No. 1 contender Evander Holyfield on June 18 at Atlantic City, N.J., but Holyfield has no contractual obligation to fight Tyson if Tyson is not the heavyweight champion.

"There's nothing wrong with losing, I can handle a loss, but I want to lose fairly," Tyson said at the post-fight news conference, which Douglas did not attend.

Douglas was felled in the eighth round by a right uppercut to the jaw. "I wasn't really hurt," Douglas said. "When I looked up the count was at six. I got up between seven and eight. I clearly heard eight."

Douglas was upright at nine, but by then the timekeeper had tolled 10, although Meyran — who failed to pick up the timekeeper's count — didn't know that. He motioned for the two boxers to resume fighting, then the bell rang.

Contrary to the old saying, the bell cannot save a fighter. It isn't rung if a fighter is down past the three-minute limit of the round, but rings if a fighter beats the 10-count.

Douglas hurt Tyson three or four times in the ninth round, and by the end of the round, Tyson's left eye was closed.

Just past the minute mark of the 10th round, Douglas landed a five-punch combination, with the key blows being a right uppercut, a left and a right to the jaw — and Tyson went down and was counted out.

The most famous long count in boxing history took place in a bout between Jack Dempsey and Gene Tunney on Sept. 22, 1927, at Chicago's Soldier Field before nearly 150,000 fans and a radio audience of 50 million.

The newly adopted knockdown rule required the standing fighter to go to the farthest neutral corner before the count would start.

After six rounds, Dempsey, seeking to regain the title he lost to Tunney a year earlier, toppled his opponent with a barrage of punches but went to the wrong corner, using up five seconds before he moved to the proper corner.

Fourteen seconds later, Tunney got up and went on to win a unanimous decision for the 10-round fight. Said Dempsey: "I was robbed."

David Svoboda

OFF THE BENCH

James "Buster" Douglas is the new heavyweight champion of the world — or is he?

If you listen to the World Boxing Council and the World Boxing Association, the answer to that question is "no." If, however, you're a fan of the International Boxing Federation, Douglas is indeed the champ.

There's something smelly about what went on in Tokyo Sunday, and that smell has made professional boxing (I like amateur) more of a sham than it was before the fight between Douglas and Mike Tyson.

In case you missed it, here's a brief synopsis of what happened in the Tokyo Dome as Saturday night became Sunday morning here in Manhattan:

Early in the fight, Douglas, a journeyman fighter from Columbus, Ohio, appeared to be dominating Tyson. Most veteran boxing observers believed the only way for Tyson to retain his title would be by knockout.

In round No. 8, Tyson floored Douglas with a combination. Here's where the controversy started. The timekeeper apparently started his count three seconds before the referee, Octavio Meyran, started his.

When Meyran initiated his count at one, the timekeeper was at four. Douglas reached his feet as the referee was between eight and nine. The round ended seconds later.

Tyson was relentless in his attempt to knock his challenger out in the ninth round, but Douglas hung tough and won the round on most cards. Then came the tenth.

Douglas, stunning the world, knocked Tyson down and out, forcing the champion's mouthpiece to pop out in the process.

Meyran tolled the count correctly, and there was a new champion of the world.

So much for what happened in the ring.

What happened outside the ring brings into serious question the legitimacy of the sport of boxing.

About six hours after the completion of the fight, officials of the WBC and WBA appeared at a press conference to announce that both organizations were holding up their championships until the fight could be reviewed. The IBF had no representative present because the Japanese Boxing Commission doesn't recognize it.

What a deal for the IBF. Because the Japanese commission didn't recognize it, the federation didn't have to be a party to the crime that was being committed by the other two governing bodies.

At that same press conference, Meyran appeared, admitted he made a mistake in not starting his count correctly on the eighth round knockdown, and left without answering questions.

Tyson and promoter Don King also appeared at the press conference, where Tyson said "... I want to lose fairly. I had him out before he had me out."

Pardon me if this sounds a bit too much like professional wrestling. I like wrestling, but I'll admit it isn't a sport. Boxing claims to be one. That claim is now on shaky ground.

Here's why:

■ Meyran made an error in not getting in synch with the timekeeper on the count, but it was just that, an error. In several different cases in the past, fighters have been the victim of slow counts. Ask Marlon Starling about human error. He was knocked down after the bell and lost a fight, but because human error was involved, the decision stood.

■ Meyran appeared at the press conference and admitted his mistake. Shall we parade a scapegoat in front of the media? Meyran's appearance and "admission of guilt" makes any future "investigation" into the allegations a joke. You don't let a key witness go to the press with his testimony before all of the facts have

Colorado defeats Lady Cats, 82-69

From Staff and Wire Reports

BOULDER, Colo. — K-State's first-half blues continued Sunday as the Lady Cats fell behind early and then saw their second-half rally fall short, losing to Colorado, 82-69.

K-State, which found itself behind at halftime for the third straight game, hit just 7-of-28 shots from the field in the first half as Colorado surged to a 31-21 halftime lead.

Center Debbie Johnson led the Lady Buffs' first-half dominance, scoring 15 points before the intermission.

The Lady Cats started the second half red-hot, closing the gap to 37-35, but from there could get no closer.

The loss dropped K-State to 8-2 in Big Eight play and into a tie for first place in the conference standings, after Missouri was able to keep pace by defeating Nebraska Saturday night, 64-58.

After K-State had cut the Colorado deficit to 37-35, the Lady Buffs went on a 23-12 run over the next six minutes to open a 60-47 lead after a Johnson bucket at the 7:07 mark.

Diana Miller nailed back-to-back three-pointers for K-State to cut the lead to 60-53, but Colorado was deadly from the free-throw line down the stretch to successfully stave off any K-State come-back.

The Lady Buffs hit 21-of-22 second-half charities. The win improved Colorado to 13-10 overall and 6-4 in the Big Eight.

Colorado never trailed in the game as the Lady Buffs jumped to a 14-2 lead to open the game.

After K-State's Nadira Hazim had tied the score at 2-2 with a layup at the 18:45 mark, K-State went scoreless for almost nine minutes before Miller broke the drought with a jumper with 12:01 remaining in the half.

Miller scored 10 of K-State's next 12 points to help the Lady Cats trim the lead to 19-14, but Colorado got hot again in the final minutes of the first stanza, and was able to post its 10-point halftime lead.

Johnson finished with 27 points, while Kamala Sherman and Benita Martin contributed 16 and 12 points, respectively.

Miller led K-State with 26 points, including 16 in the second half to move into 13th place on the K-State career scoring charts with 1,059 points. Kristie Bahner and Rita Matteucci also scored in double digits for the Lady Cats, tallying 14 and 13 points apiece.

The Lady Cats will play three of their final four games in the friendly confines of Bramlage Coliseum. The next contest is Wednesday night when Oklahoma visits for a 7 p.m. matchup.

'Ski' perfect against Buffaloes

By Scott Paske
Sports Reporter

Wildcat freshman Askia Jones and his father may have a good chat some day about Saturday. Both had days to remember on the basketball court. Dad's came in the National Basketball Association's legends game. "Ski" had his in Bramlage Coliseum.

And while Wali Jones, a former Philadelphia 76er, was being recognized as one of the greats of the game, it was his son who displayed flashes of brilliance in a 93-65 rout of Colorado.

"Ski had an outstanding ball game," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "He opened the thing with a lot of poise and composure, which isn't a surprise because he handles things awfully well."

Jones' performance was solid from start to finish, as the native of San Antonio, Texas, netted a career-high 18 points and pulled down six rebounds in 25 minutes. The 6-foot-5 forward, who held Missouri standout Anthony Peeler to a 5-of-20 shooting night Thursday, went 8-of-8 from the field against the Buffaloes.

K-State shot a season-high 56.7 percent for the game.

"I got the ball in rhythm in our offense," Jones said. "Shooting wise, I felt pretty good out there. Real confident."

Jones got the 'Cats off to a fast start, scoring a pair of layups in the opening minute of the game. Later in the half, Jones went outside, canning a trio of baseline jump shots and another from the right wing. The last one gave the 'Cats a 42-24 lead at halftime.

At intermission, all but four of K-State's points had come from perimeter players, as Steve Henson scored 15, Jean Derouillere had nine and Jeff Wires two. Jones and Henson combined for an 11-of-13 shooting effort.

"We got off to a good start, which has obviously been a concern for this team," Kruger said. "We got some good shots, had good pace and hit the shots that we had."

Jones, who had made just 33 percent of his shots heading into Saturday, continued strong in the second half. His three-point play on a layup and foul by Colorado's Brent Vaughn gave K-State a 47-26 lead. He concluded his scoring with a driving baseline layup at the 8:55 mark that pushed the 'Cats lead to 64-40.

Jones couldn't recall a perfect shooting game during his prep career at San Antonio's Marshall High School.

"In high school, I shot a lot more, so I'm sure I missed one or two at least," he said. "We've got other great scorers on this team, so I try and find them."

Kruger said Jones' performance could be a sign of things to come. "He hasn't shot a real good percentage in games, but he'll become a good shooter."

Freshman "Ski" Jones dribbles past Colorado's Asad Ali Saturday in the Wildcats' victory over the Buffaloes. Jones had his best outing of his young K-State career, going 8-of-8 from the field for 18 points.

East stars down West

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — It was truly an All-Star show for the Eastern Conference on Sunday.

No one on the East had more than 17 points, but nine players had at least eight in a 130-113 victory over the West, which got strong performances from Magic Johnson and Tom Chambers but shot only 43.8 percent from the field.

It was the lowest total for a losing team in an All-Star game since the West lost 123-109 in 1976.

Michael Jordan and Charles Barkley had 17 each for the East. Isaiah Thomas had 15 points and nine assists, Robert Parish 14 points and Patrick Ewing 12 points and 10 rebounds.

Johnson was the Most Valuable Player with 22 points, one more than his highest total in eight previous All-Star appearances. He also hit four 3-pointers, matching in one game the career All-Star record by Thomas. Johnson, who had five 3-point attempts Sunday, now has five career All-Star 3-pointers.

Chambers added 21 points for the West.

Missouri's Doug Smith bounced back from a dismal performance against the 'Cats Thursday, scoring 44 points for Missouri Saturday.

Smith fires Mizzou; tallies 44

By The Associated Press

It seemed entirely possible that Missouri (22-2 overall, 8-1 in the Big Eight) would be No. 2 and Kansas (24-1, 7-1) No. 1 Tuesday night when the Tigers pay their annual visit to Kansas' Allen Fieldhouse.

"What a game that's going to be," said Nebraska center Richard King, who had just had a front row seat for one of the best performances in Missouri history. "That's a game I'm going to watch."

King will probably be paying special attention to Missouri's Doug Smith. The 6-10 senior, who had only 13 points in Missouri's loss to K-State, exploded for 44 — two short of the school record — against the Huskers in Missouri's win Saturday.

Elsewhere in a busy weekend for the poll-proud Big Eight, and Oklahoma State dropped a 100-84 verdict at No. 9 UNLV on Saturday.

Sunday, No. 13 Oklahoma carved out an 89-84 victory at Seton Hall. Smith spent much of the day camped beneath the Nebraska basket as Missouri tied a school record with its 29th straight home victory. Smith fell just two points short of the school's single-game scoring record set in 1961 against Nebraska by Joe Scott.

"I wanted the ball today," said Smith, who had 31 in Missouri's earlier victory this year over Nebraska. "I felt like I could take it right to them. Everything felt right."

"Doug Smith had a tremendous game," said Missouri Coach Norm Stewart. "Our intensity level is coming back up. That's what we lost the other night. We got that back today."

Missouri's Anthony Peeler had 16 points but missed his first free throw and failed to break the school record of 28 in a row. King had 25 points for the Huskers.

This Kansas team has yet to capture a national championship, but it has already done something no Danny Manning team ever did. It has won at Iowa State.

"I'm really happy for our seniors because we said before the game, 'Let's not let them get out of here without them winning one at every place,'" Kansas Coach Roy Williams said.

With three minutes remaining, Iowa State went ahead 81-80. But Kansas' Rick Calloway answered with a long jump shot. Kevin Pritchard, a senior guard, led five Jayhawks in double figures with 18 points.

"Our experienced players really did the job and held their poise down the stretch," Williams said. "I think that was really the key in the game."

The Cyclones don't have many victories to show for the last 11 days. But in losing to Missouri, Kansas and Oklahoma, they have been outscored a total of only 12 points.

"I don't know how you can play any harder than either one of these teams did," Iowa State Coach Johnny Orr said. Paul Doerrfeld and Doug Collins led Iowa State with 15 points each.

Five UNLV players hit double figures against Oklahoma State, including little-known Moses Scurry, who came off the bench to score a career-high 23 points.

"You learn to expect that from a team loaded with talent," said Oklahoma State Coach Leonard Hamilton, whose Cowboys were led by Byron Houston's 27 points. "You can't stop everybody and we couldn't stop him."

Oklahoma Coach Billy Tubbs insisted he was disappointed with the way his Sooners beat Seton Hall.

"I wish we could have played a little bit better basketball for you," Tubbs said after the nationally televised game. "We like to rock 'n roll. But this game was more like a waltz."

"We are always looking to score 100 points, especially today because the game was on national TV," said Oklahoma's Damon Patterson, who had 19 points and 13 rebounds. "We could have done it if we kept running."

Track team has little success at tough Husker Invitational

From Staff and Wire Reports

K-State saw some of the toughest competition in the nation Friday and Saturday at the Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb. The Wildcats only came up with one first place finish, but Coach John Capriotti said that fact must be put into perspective.

The annual meet has evolved into one of the top events in the country. This year's field saw more than 70 schools represented and Capriotti said he thought the team finished the meet well.

The highlight of the meet for K-State was the 3,200-meter relay team's performance. Jared Storm, Pat Hessini, Jason Goertzen and Marcus Wright combined for a 7:35.27 clocking to win the race. Kansas finished a close second at 7:35.57, while Alabama placed third in 7:35.70.

Storm, a freshman, was also the first athlete to break a K-State record this season. Storm placed third in the 1,000 meters breaking the Wildcats mark with a time of 2:25.62.

Angie Miller earned the highest placing for the K-State women. Miller, who had been undefeated this season in the shot put, saw that streak come to an end. She placed second with a mark of 50-11½.

However, Miller continued her streak of national qualifying throws; she has yet to throw under the national standard — 49-6¼.

"Overall I was pleased with the way we competed, however we had some people who didn't come. We need to get them back in the lineup before the Big Eight meet," Capriotti said. "There were also a couple other people who had disappointing efforts, but if we can get them going I think we'll be ok."

Several K-State men and women improved their season-best marks and should move up on the Big Eight's top 10 lists.

Tyrone Watkins placed fourth in the 400 meters with a time of 47.98, which is a provisional national qualifying mark. His previous best was 48.50.

Freshman Thomas Randolph ran the 55 meters in 6.29 and placed second in his heat, but failed to make it to the finals.

The 4x400-meter relay team placed fifth and turned in its best time of the season, 3:14.97.

Outdoor all-American high jumper, Connie Teaberry, continued to improve. Teaberry met the NCAA provisional qualifying mark of 5-11 at the Illini Classic two meets ago, and at Nebraska she cleared 5-11½ to tie for third place.

Joy Jones ran the 400 meters in 55.32 lowering her season-best mark and also becoming a provisional national qualifier. Jones placed sixth in the event.

K-STATE RESULTS

(those placing in top 6)

Men

400 Meters — Tyrone Watkins, 4th, 47.98.
800 Meters — Marcus Wright, 6th, 1:53.66.
1,000 Meters — Jared Storm, 3rd, 2:25.62.
1 Mile Run — David Warders, 4th, 4:09.51.
Triple Jump — Orio Berry, 4th, 49-9½.
Long Jump — Clifton Etheridge, 4th, 24-4.
4x400-meter relay — KSU, 5th, 3:14.97.
3,200-meter relay — KSU (Storm, Hessini, Goertzen, Wright), 1st, 7:35.27.

Women

400 Meters — Joy Jones, 6th, 55.32.
3,000 Meters — Angie Barry, 4th, 9:36.98.
5,000 Meters — Marge Eddy, 4th, 17:26.2.
Long Jump — Carla Shannon, 5th, 19-2½.
Shot Put — Angie Miller, 2nd, 50-11½.
High Jump — Connie Teaberry, 5th, 5-11½.

Colorado's Rodell "House" Guest (33) tries to get around K-State forward Reggie Britt (31) in the second half Saturday.

scored in double figures. Jean Derouillere and Askia Jones had 18 points each and Henson added 17 to lead the Wildcat blitz.

"We got off to a good start and our confidence continued to go up," said Henson, who was a perfect 3-of-3 from three-point range. "Everybody was shooting well from the perimeter."

Shooting better than anyone else was Jones, who was a perfect 8-of-8 from the floor. The only thing between Jones and a dream game was a missed free throw.

And for Derouillere, who missed by two points having his third-straight 20-plus outing, the 18 points were exactly 18 more than he had during the loss against the 'Buffs in Boulder.

"We had something to prove," Derouillere said. "Something to prove to ourselves."

The Wildcats did that on both ends, limiting the 'Buffs to 40 percent shooting from the floor. Stevie Wise led Colorado and all scorers with 22 points, but his efforts weren't enough to keep the visitors from falling to 1-8 in the conference and 9-13 overall.

Remote sensing aids researchers

By Stacie Sanders
Collegian Reporter

Satellites do more than catch television signals and monitor military moves.

They can be used to help understand ecosystems, said researchers at the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area.

Duane Nellis, associate professor of geography, and John Briggs, data manager for the Long Term Ecological Research Program on the Konza Prairie, have been conducting research using remote sensing.

Remote sensing involves the collection of data by satellites to study Earth's surface.

The data are not in the form of pictures taken from the satellite, but come as recorded intensities of reflection in different proportions of electromagnetic energy, Nellis said.

He said there are two major components to the research conducted on the Konza Prairie. One is field research conducted by the biology department.

The second component is the Long Term Ecological Research Program, Nellis said. Remote sensing falls under this component.

The researchers initially began looking at Landsat information, which has repetitive coverage every 18 days, he said. Repetitive coverage means the satellite will pass around Earth and over the Konza Prairie every 18 days.

The satellite has two types of sensors on board, Nellis said. The first is a multispectral scanner with an 80-meter resolution, and the second is a thematic mapper with a 30-meter resolution. Multispectral scanners have four channels of data, and thematic mappers have seven.

The researchers began looking at the use of the satellite-provided data to estimate living matter and primary productivity, he said.

Briggs said the different variables detected with the satellite are relative to the different burning treatments going on at the Konza Prairie.

From the data, Briggs said the researchers can distinguish an annually burned area from an adjacent unburned area.

Nellis said the burning treatments are based on watershed boundaries on the Konza Prairie. Each watershed is burned at intervals. Some are burned every year, others are burned less frequently and still others are left unburned.

"The reason for doing this is to understand the long term ecological changes as we look back, as well as look forward," he said.

Even before the early settlers came to this area, the Indians burned the prairie to enhance the grassland for grazing bison, Nellis said.

"We're trying to understand from a more synoptic view what the processes are and also how well we can use the satellite data to monitor these changes," Nellis said.

Before satellites, all the information was collected by hand, he said. The process involved clipping an area, drying the clippings and weighing the differences.

"With the satellite, we can estimate certain things fairly accurately," Nellis said.

He said they are using both methods to find out how reliable the satellite data are, relative to the field data.

"So to really understand from a broader perspective what the dynamics of biospheric change are, we need this more synoptic view," he said.

By using mathematic formulas called algorithms, the researchers have been trying to estimate the degree of homogeneity or heterogeneity in different landscape units, Nellis said.

"With remote sensing, we use mathematical algorithms as a quantitative tool to measure the diversity in a landscape," Briggs said.

More recently with this study, they have used SPOT data, Nellis said.

SPOT is a French satellite which has repetitive coverage every 26 days and higher resolution than the Landsat data.

Nellis said they are pursuing a project involving the integration of remote sensing with other types of spatial data, a relatively new technology, in what is called a geographic information system.

This type of software allows one to develop a relationship of different databases tied to a certain location, Nellis said. Various information about the location, such as atmospheric conditions and climatological data, may be integrated to make a model based on the specific area.

"Now, for the first time, we are able to develop spatially explicit models using the geographic information system," Briggs said. "In that component, remote sensing just becomes one data layer we can bring in."

"This, I think, is kind of a natural evolution here as far as data management from a spatial perspective," Nellis said.

They are also looking at the impact of bison on the prairie for a research proposal to be sent to NASA and the National Science Foundation, Nellis said.

With the improved computer capabilities, the researchers are able to handle larger databases that allow them to do fairly detailed analyses of extensive areas, he said.

"As long as the NSF-LTER Program continues at Konza, I feel like we'll have a component for continued research," Nellis said.

He said the long-term goal of the project is to understand, from a global scale, the changes occurring on Earth and how changes in a tall grass prairie ecosystem differ from the ecosystems of a short grass prairie or a tundra.

'Clay Cellar' becomes studio

Local potters use Oriental method in creating artwork for display, sale

By Joann Beckman
Collegian Reporter

Raku, a ceramic firing method which originated in 16th century Japan, is used by three local potters.

Joyce Furney, Ronna Rounds and Gary Tyson create their pottery at the Clay Cellar, a studio located east of Manhattan.

Raku was developed by Zen Buddhist monks to create vessels for tea ceremonies, Furney said. To them, it was a philosophical experience.

"We in the West, not being involved in the Oriental experience, have taken Raku to a technical process," she said.

Furney said the process involves forming a pot with white Raku clay, which is formulated to withstand extreme thermal shock.

The pot is glazed with white glaze or a combination of white and metallic oxide glazes.

The pot is then fired to about 1,800 degrees Fahrenheit. It is removed from the kiln and immediately placed into a reduction barrel.

The barrel contains combustible material such as leaves and straw. When the hot pot ignites the combustible material, the lid is put on the barrel to smother the fire.

At this point, if a metallic oxide glaze was used, the glaze is reduced because the fire robs the oxygen from it. This produces metallic luster colors.

Also, carbon from the smoke collects in the white glaze where the pot is left unglazed. This produces a crackle effect that is traditional to Raku.

The pot is then removed from the reduction barrel and quenched in water. This freezes the metallic luster colors and prevents them from re-oxidizing.

Furney, Rounds and Tyson primarily work with Raku and stoneware, but they also use other clays and techniques.

Rounds, for instance, enjoys working in porcelain.

"Porcelain resists your changes, and so you have to have a real delicate finesse to manipulate that body," she said. "But it's very satisfying to throw with that clay."

Furney founded the Clay Cellar as her working studio in the basement of the Carry Hatchery in Alma. She moved the studio to Manhattan in 1985.

Furney received a Bachelor of Fine Arts degree from K-State in 1985. She has also studied clay and sculpture at the University of Colorado in Boulder, Weber State College in Ogden, Utah and Utah State University in Logan, Utah.

Rounds joined Furney at the Clay Cellar in spring 1988. She taught pottery and had an in-house studio in Canada before deciding to attend K-State. She is pursuing a Bachelor of Fine Arts degree and a bachelor's degree in art education.

Tyson joined the group in fall 1988. He received a Bachelor of Fine Arts degree from K-State in May 1988.

Cafe offers taste of Texas

Backroads eatery model for Lone Star

Jim Rourk

REVIEW

How many restaurants in the Manhattan area do you know that have a dozen cactus plants in the middle of the dining room floor and a Texas flag proudly displayed on their wall?

The Lone Star Cafe in Aggieville, located at the corner of Laramie and 12th streets, is such a place, with a sun lamp hanging above a large cactus bed.

The owners, Betty and John Heritage, have accomplished a Texas backroads cafe eating atmosphere in this cafe.

Betty said the sun lamp hangs above the cactus bed because at first the cactus died from insufficient sun light. The lamp is usually not turned on during peak dining hours because of the intensity of the light.

John said that before establishing the Lone Star in Manhattan, he traveled backroads in Texas, looking for the quintessential small-town-Texas eatery. John ate in as many of these eateries as he could and came back to Manhattan. Together with a chef, John developed Lone Star's own sauces, chips, side dishes and salsas. Chips and salsa are served with every order.

During my visit to the Lone Star I ate a stacked taco. This is a dish of several tortillas with seasoned chicken, black beans, green chiles, a San Antonio style sauce, pico de gallo (pronounced peek-o da guy-o) and a side of beans and rice.

This dish was hearty with only mildly hot spices. The green chiles were prepared well and served to compliment the corn tortillas that served as the basis of the dish.

Like several of the special dishes prepared at the Lone Star, the stacked taco is not usually on the regular menu. The Lone Star has daily specials.

The beans were borracho beans, my favorite of those offered at the restaurant. Literally translated, their name means drunken beans because they are soaked or roasted in beer.

One of my favorite items on the menu is the "Create Your Own Tacos." For $10.95 two people can put together their own combinations of shredded chicken or beef, lettuce, pico de gall, guacamole, beans and sour cream. All these dishes are on the side and one can add the desired quantities to his own taco.

The quantities of food served at the Lone Star are plentiful and beer is served in frosty mugs. Sometimes the mugs are even so cold the beer ices over a tad.

The Lone Star Cafe is a unique, pleasant dining experience in the heart of the city, where prices are reasonable and food plentiful.

Women's Resource Center gives support, counseling

By Sandy Hegarty
Collegian Reporter

The Women's Resource Center at Kansas State University is open to all people concerned with women's issues regardless of their gender, race, class, lifestyle or physical ability.

The mission is to provide direct service to individual students and to people in the community who are having problems, said Judy Davis, director of the center.

"People generally come here facing some sort of crisis," Davis said. "Many have problems with violence of some sorts."

Davis said she is the first full-time director of the center since its opening in the early 1970s. She started the position in fall 1988. In addition to her work at the center, she gives lectures to classes on campus.

Information on such topics as women's organizations, local and national women's programs and women's issues and concerns such as education, health, employment, family, careers, violence and rape is available through the WRC, Davis said.

She said the center's staff can also answer questions about women's issues or make referrals to other local, state, regional or national resources and services.

The WRC is concerned primarily with raising the level of awareness of students regarding the changing roles of men and women, Davis said. Both men and women are welcome and invited to use the center. Davis said anyone can volunteer to work at the center.

The center also sponsors interest and support groups. The groups provide an opportunity for women to share mutual concerns, she said. New groups are formed each year to cover any need, demand or interest made known to the staff at the center.

Some of the support groups now sponsored by the center include the Surviving Homesickness, Single Parents Support and Sexual Assault Survivor Support groups.

The Sexual Violence Prevention program is a new program at the center. It was started to educate the campus community about sexual violence, she said.

"There's a variety of different kinds of activities to educate students and the community as a whole," Davis said.

Part of the center's role is to work with faculty to make them aware of biases against women that might discourage women from entering certain academic programs, she said.

The center also offers counseling services. The staff can assist students through difficult times by providing informal support, by referring students to other sources of assistance in the area and by advocating for individual students, Davis said.

The counseling services are offered in conjunction with the Women's Clinic at Lafene Student Health Center.

Air force bombing kills 6, injures 20

By The Associated Press

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Air force planes and helicopters strafed and bombed suspected leftist rebel positions near a northeastern village Sunday, killing at least six people and wounding 20, a witness said.

Fighting broke out around 6:30 a.m. in the village of Corral de Piedra, 53 miles northeast of the capital, said a female church worker who insisted on anonymity for fear of reprisals.

"The planes and helicopters did their work for about two hours," she said. "We were in chapel when we heard the shooting in the hills, and we heard about 10 bombs explode, shaking the chapel, and the dust then sifted in under the doors."

Telephone calls to the press office at military headquarters for comment were not immediately returned.

A resettlement camp for refugees in the decade-old civil war in Corral de Piedra, in Chaltenango province, appeared to be one of the targets, the witness said in a telephone interview.

"When people finally dared to go out, we went into a house and we saw five children and one adult dead. The roof of the house was blown up by a bomb. At the same spot I saw about 20 wounded people," the witness added.

The witness said she was able to get a car and evacuate five of the wounded.

A nurse at the Chaltenango Regional Hospital told the Associated Press that the wounded were being evacuated there from Corral de Piedra where, she said, there had been fighting between guerrillas and government troops.

"There are more than 10 wounded here. We have a lot of work. Another three (wounded) were taken to San Salvador and it is known there are many dead there (in the village)," the nurse said. She, too, insisted on anonymity.

Senior military officers have been publicly saying in recent weeks the people at the Corral de Piedra camp were secretly collaborating with the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, a coalition of five guerrilla organizations fighting for power.

Aquarium care crucial for fish to live

By Tammy Breitenbach
Collegian Reporter

Simply admiring fish and having the money for supplies does not guarantee maintaining a successful aquarium.

"The best way to learn is just to set up your tank and get started," said Amy Swindle, a pet counselor at Petland. "Some people follow the directions and still lose fish."

The potential size of the fish should be considered in relation to the size of the tank, Swindle said. Large fish will not thrive in a small tank.

Fish will grow to their full size regardless of whether the tank is big enough for them, she said. With a tank that holds 10 gallons of water or less, a fish guaranteed to get no larger than one to two inches works best. Goldfish are one of the most popular breeds, said Carol Fanshier, an employee at Green Thumb Plants and Pets.

The Betta fish can do well by themselves in a small bowl without a filter, she said.

Although Bettas are safe in a tank with other fish, they may fight each other, sometimes to death, said Susan Rush, department manager of pets and plants at Wal-Mart. Almost any fish will pick on a sick one, she said.

A small type of catfish called the Otocinclus grows to two inches and eats algae off the sides of the tank, Swindle said. They are good for maintaining a clean environment and are compatible with other fish. When they run out of algae, they will eat flaked fish food, unlike some other algae eaters.

"The Chinese algae eater is an identical looking fish which grows up to four inches in length, but when the algae is gone, it starts attaching itself to the fish and killing them," Swindle said. "We've stopped carrying these unless they are a special order."

Fish larger than 12 inches require at least a 45-gallon tank, Swindle said.

"A lot of the guys seem to get the piranhas and oscars because they get bigger, and they eat live food, like goldfish and guppies," Fanshier said.

Large feeder fish such as these should be fed a staple diet of freeze-dried brine shrimp or flake food every day and live food once a week, Swindle said. A 6- to 8-inch oscar requires about three goldfish per feeding, but it will eat as many fish as it can find, she said.

"I've seen oscars with three goldfish hanging out of their mouth and still chasing another one," Swindle said.

Swindle does not recommend giving feeder fish live food every day because it can be expensive, and they will not be getting a balanced diet. Feeder goldfish cost about 25 cents each.

Before putting the fish into the water, the tank should run for a day or two to make sure the heater and the pump are working well, Swindle said. The temperature of the water should be about 78 degrees.

"No more than two fish per week should be added to the tank, she said. The water may be cloudy at first but will clear up in a few days.

"Most people say, 'Let's get all the fish in at once and it will be pretty,'" Swindle said, "but the fish set off bacteria. If too many are put in, they will cause diseases and it will be Armageddon in there."

Carolyn Anderson, co-owner of Green Thumb, said one inch of fish for every gallon of water in the tank will keep it from being overcrowded.

"I have found that a lot of college kids have the mini hex tanks because they think that they are easier to take care of, but actually the bigger tanks require less maintenance," Swindle said.

A 10-gallon tank is of moderate size and is easy to take care of, Fanshier said.

Undergravel filters are the best available, Swindle said. They are inexpensive and maintain a healthy bacterial environment necessary to break down toxins in the water as they filter through.

Fanshier said plants are good for covering up air tubes and add atmosphere to the tank.

Food service work trains students

Dieticians responsible for supervision of food serving lines, menu planning

By Melissa Simpson
Staff Reporter

Helping plan menus, supervising serving lines and figuring labor and food costs are the responsibilities of 11 senior dietetics students this semester.

These students are enrolled in the Coordinated Program in Dietetics offered by the Department of Hotel, Restaurant and Institution Management and Dietetics. They are required to spend one semester working at one of the food services on campus or at Stoneybrook Health Center in Manhattan.

Jeff Fox, a student dietitian, said his work as a student dietitian begins at 6:15 a.m. every weekday. Fox said he makes sure all the student employees working for Boyd food service are present and supervises them as they prepare for the breakfast crowd.

After the breakfast crowd is finished, Fox said, he begins the same process again for the lunch crowd.

"The key to my job is pleasing the customer, and getting them through the line fast," he said. "I'm also responsible for positioning the food and the workers so both lines will run smoothly."

Deb Canter, director of the coordinated program, said the students receive nine credit hours for their work experience during their management semester. They also attend a one-hour lecture three times a week in addition to the 25-30 hours of hands-on experience at their work site each week.

"The coordinated program is accredited by the American Dietetic Association. In order to receive the B.S. degree, 900 hours of supervised practice must be completed," Canter said.

Student dietitian Suzanne Swaney said she hasn't encountered any bad experiences yet at her management job at Smurthwaite House.

Swaney said she has to make a food list every day and fill out a requisition for the next day's food. She said she is also responsible for making sure the food gets to Smurthwaite, planning the menus and making sure the food is prepared.

"The hardest part about my job is pleasing the girls," Swaney said. "Keeping them happy with the food selections on the menu is tough."

Canter said the coordinated program in dietetics is an accelerated program, because what used to be done in five years is now done in four.

"In essence, we're taking what has traditionally been a fifth year internship, and putting it back in their junior and senior years," she said. "It's a very intense program, so we look for pretty strong students that can handle it."

Malley Sisson, assistant director for food service at the K-State Union, said two student dieticians are working in Union food service this semester.

Sisson said the student dieticians work around the hot food serving line area. She said one dietitian will have more production responsibilities such as bread and dairy ordering.

"What they do depends upon what time of the year they're here," Sisson said.

Sisson said another of the student dieticians' responsibilities is preventing employee injuries.

"Unfortunately, in our business, we have more injuries than what we should have," Sisson said. "They're usually due to back strain from lifting. So we have the student hold training sessions on preventing back strain and avoiding injury."

After a management semester with food campus services, the students in the coordinated program go to Wichita to work at a large hospital for a semester, Sisson said. Resident faculty at the University of Kansas School of Medicine in Wichita teach the students' classes.

Students are assigned to a hospital and to a physician. They make rounds with the physician and study patients' diets for a semester.

After completion of the clinical dietetics and community nutrition semester in Wichita, the students have completed 1,035 hours of supervised practice.

"When they go to Wichita, their hours are carefully planned," Canter said.

Fox said that he is looking forward to his clinical semester in Wichita, but he hasn't made a career decision yet.

"That's a lot of hours without pay," Fox said. "It's just like a job, so I wish there was a way we could be compensated."

Canter said dietitian students are trained in three areas: community nutrition, clinical nutrition and food service management. With hands-on training in these areas, she said she hopes students are then knowledgeable about career choices.

"I feel the program allows personal, one-to-one interaction between the students and instructors," Sisson said. "It's challenging, it's professional and it can only be a win-win situation."

Large fall rush makes open period unnecessary

By Todd Ubben
Collegian Reporter

Because of the increased number of women taken by sororities during the formal rush in August, sororities are not having traditional open rush this spring, said Barb Robel, director of Greek Affairs.

"We're being overwhelmed by numbers in the fall," Robel said. "Our rush numbers have gone up over the last several years, and the sororities are taking as many as possible."

In the past, two or three chapters have chosen to participate in the two-week open rush period, although sororities can rush throughout the year, Robel said.

The open rush period is designated by the Panhellenic Council, the governing body of the Greek organizations. Open rush benefits the women interested in rushing, she said.

"They know when to sign up and they know when it's going to end, rather than having to continue throughout the semester," Robel said.

In the fall, the Panhellenic Council sets a quota on the number of women that can be pledged by each sorority. The quota is figured by dividing the number of women participating in formal rush by the number of chapters.

Robel said 613 women went through formal rush in the fall, setting a quota of 54. Eight of the 11 sororities, she said, have met the quota.

In 1987 and 1988, the quota was 47; in 1986, 35; and in 1985, 34, Robel said.

A new chapter, Sigma Kappa, will be added in the fall partly in response to the increased numbers.

"Hopefully, it will reduce the quota somewhat," Robel said.

Stefanie Nyland, Kappa Delta rush chairwoman and sophomore in physical education, said the KDs are already preparing for formal rush to be held in August.

The Alpha Chi Omega sorority had a successful year and met the quota, said rush chairwoman Nikki Oliver, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education.

Despite the expected increase in numbers of students, open rush will remain an option, Robel said.

THE SIMPSONS

Fox's animated series popular

Mark Butler

REVIEW

Few television shows stand out like "The Simpsons" on the fledgling Fox network. This fact, however, can be explained by the fact that there are no other shows remotely like it on prime-time network television today.

"The Simpsons" is the first animated network series to be broadcast in prime time since "The Flintstones," in the late 1960s. But apart from both being cartoon families, the Simpson and Flintstone clans are worlds apart.

Illustrator Matt Groening created the Simpsons at the request of "Tracy Ullman Show" producer James Brooks. Brooks, familiar with the biting social commentary of Groening's weekly strip "Life in Hell," approached the artist to create a new group of characters to appear briefly between sketches on Ullman's show. The Simpsons' popularity grew with each exposure.

The characters' major breakthrough came when they were featured in commercials for Butterfinger candy bars. Bratty Bart Simpson's catchphrase of "Au contraire, mon frere" was quickly being mispronounced across the country. Soon, "Simpsons" short films were being tacked onto theatrical films and video releases. Last November, plans of a weekly series were announced, and in December a Simpsons holiday special appeared on Fox to high acclaim. Stars of sorts were born.

Those whose suggest that cartoons are for children only may find themselves silenced by a viewing of a "Simpsons" episode. The humor is remarkably sophisticated by television standards although typical for Groening, who seems to have retained a great deal of creative control.

An early episode featured habitual delinquent Bart switching achievement tests with the class brain. To his teachers' and parents' surprise, Bart was accepted into a school for gifted children. As always, risible subtleties abounded through the show. For example, an ever-so-brief shot showed Bart's previously condemned graffiti cordoned off by museum ropes. Viewers are challenged to keep up with details that whiz by.

Surrealistic humor is also a "Simpsons" hallmark. A typical episode may suddenly shift to a demented fantasy sequence without warning. A recent episode found Simpsons' patriarch, Homer, envisioning his family as a group of demonic zombies, yet another allusion by Groening that "life is hell."

Plots are often twisted and complicated. One show began at Homer's company picnic and ended with the family triumphing over a swindling family therapist. These complex segments deftly intertwine and offer the show more targets to hit with satirical comment. That particular episode attacked nasty bosses, the nuclear power industry, television (according to Bart "one of the few things I have faith in") and family counseling, to name a few.

The show's scheduled time slot is ideal for a college audience at 7:30 Sunday night. Forget tripe like "He-Man" and "The Gummi Bears." "The Simpsons" make watching cartoons cool again.

McCain faculty arts series to feature brass quintet

By Laura Scroggins
Collegian Reporter

The McCain Faculty Arts Series will feature the Kansas State University Faculty Brass Quintet at 8 p.m. Tuesday in the All Faiths Chapel.

The quintet is made up of Jack Flower, music department chairman; Craig Parker, associate professor of music; Gary Mortenson, assistant professor of music; Bernard Buster, a former faculty member; and Byron Jensen, doctoral candidate in education. They will perform a total of six pieces.

Parker said of the six pieces, the "Suite for Brass" is the most difficult in the concert. It is also the piece that the rest of the concert was primarily scheduled around.

Mozart's "Divertimento," is also on the schedule for the evening. It was originally written for the woodwinds and was translated into a brass piece by a member of the Chicago Brass Quintet, Parker said.

In the late 18th Century, the time of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and his contemporaries, brass instruments were not the instruments of choice, he said. They were used most often as fanfare instruments. It was not until the invention of the valve that the brass instruments were better represented by composers.

"Brass instruments then were totally different than they are now," Parker said.

Halftime performers entertain fans

By Tammy Breitenbach
Staff Reporter

When the K-State basketball team heads for the locker room at halftime, entertainers hit the basketball court. Drill teams, aerobiziers, children's groups, singers, basketball daredevils and, of course, K-State cheerleaders and Pridettes all want to be in the halftime spotlight.

Almost anyone is eligible to be halftime entertainment, said Chris Peterson, assistant athletic director. The performers don't have to audition or pay for the chance to entertain.

The KSU Athletic Department starts receiving performance requests several months prior to basketball season, Peterson said. An attempt is made to plug people into the schedule where it is most convenient for them.

"We try to put the high school groups in during Christmas break so that parents and grandparents can buy tickets to see them," he said.

Peterson said the department has been fortunate to have quality performers, especially ones from K-State.

"Halftime is a great opportunity for K-Staters to showcase their other talents besides athletics," he said. "Singers are a great tribute to our choir."

"We try to take care of our own students first—like our cheerleaders and the Pridettes," Peterson said. "We have some very talented students and believe in giving the students of K-State priority. Without the students, we wouldn't be here. We (the athletic department and other departments) need to work together."

Scheduling conflicts sometimes occur when groups exceed the time limit, preventing the performance of the next act.

"We give groups three minutes, but most don't think it's any big deal if they go five or six," Peterson said. "People don't always take set-up time into consideration."

Other problems occur in scheduling when corporate sponsors of the athletic department want to bring groups in on short notice, said Dave Ebberts, assistant director of marketing and sales for the athletic department.

The department tries to accommodate the sponsors, Ebberts said, sometimes making it necessary to move scheduled student groups.

"We try to make as many groups happy as possible, but of course you can't please everyone," Peterson said.

Janelle Rundle, co-director of Pridettes, said the Pridettes would like to perform more often at halftime. The Pridettes represent K-State as a dance line.

The group would like to be considered by the public and the athletic department as more of a staple of entertainment, she said.

"We want to work hard and be there to support the team," Cheryl Fearnside, co-director of Pridettes, said. "It's like another pep squad. We really want to show our spirit."

The cheerleaders start putting in requests for performance time during football season, said Michelle Thamer, cheerleading coach.

Recruitment becomes focus of graduate school

By Julie Wakeman
Collegian Reporter

The graduate school is making efforts to increase the resources needed to recruit quality graduate students to K-State.

Timothy Donoghue, dean of the graduate school and vice provost for research, said he considers graduate recruiting a very strong focal point for K-State.

Donoghue said that graduate student recruitment is more specific because the students consider a particular program of study instead of the university as a whole. When students consider one certain program, he said, they look at the resources, faculty and facilities available.

Gerald Reeck, associate dean of the graduate school said prospective graduate students also consider a school's prestige and the cost of tuition when deciding where to attend graduate school.

Reeck said the Big Eight graduate schools are not as prestigious as Big Ten schools and many schools on the East Coast. Also, the stipends that K-State has to offer are less than those of other schools that also have the prestige attraction.

Donoghue said Kansas is one of the states that requires graduate students to pay for tuition out of the stipends awarded to them. He said they would like to change this but it will be a long process.

"We're trying all different approaches to attract students to make them aware of the quality and number of our programs," Donoghue said.

One of those approaches is the position developed for recruiting graduate students. Bobette McGaughey, assistant to the dean of the graduate school, sends information to prospective graduate students. She said they use locator services to get lists of students who are interested in graduate school.

"Part of our mission is to improve the quality of students we get," Donoghue said.

Reeck said University officials are happy about the attraction of minority and international students to K-State.

"If we didn't have world-wide emphasis on coming to graduate school at K-State, we wouldn't have enough people to keep some of the certain programs we have," he said.

Reeck said many other universities are more well-known for research and graduate education, but K-State has good programs to offer and the cost of school and living are much lower than at other universities.

Reeck also said that reducing fees and having a stipend supplement are small steps to increasing the number of graduate students here, but that more money to give to the graduate students must be supplied by the legislature.

They Might Be Giants open 'Flood' LP with jingle

Unclassifiable sound and 'weird' lyrics produce enjoyable combination for duo

Mark
Butler

REVIEW

"Why are the ocean levels rising? It's a brand new record for 1990! They Might Be Giants' brand new album: 'Flood'!" — "Theme From Flood" by They Might Be Giants

There are an infinite number of ways to begin an album, theoreticcally. Eclectic New York duo They Might Be Giants choose a rare introduction, a promotional jingle for their new release. This tactic does not seem so odd after listening to the entirety of "Flood" by the band described as "a couple of guys named John."

"Flood" is the band's third album and it still features an unclassifiable sound. Name a musical style and it can be found somewhere within the 19 tracks. Add a batch of weird lyrics concerning topics from night-lights to artificial foreheads to that musical soup and you've got They Might Be Giants. Perhaps the strangest thing about their album is how catchy and enjoyable the whole thing is.

This new release finds the band adding a bit of polish to the proceedings but without detracting from their naive charm. Four of the songs were produced by British pop masterminds Clive Langer and Alan Winstanley who are best known for their work with Elvis Costello and Madness. The Giants' new record label, Elektra, must have felt Langer and Winstanley's production would add some commercial sheen to the songs. Ultimately, there is little discernible difference in sound quality between those four songs and the others that were produced by the band.

Overall, "Flood" is an improvement over the group's previous two stand-out albums. A few undistinguished songs cause the album to begin to drag but the majority is hallmarked by a brace of catchy, twisted songs.

The first single from the album, "Birdhouse in Your Soul," is something of an odd choice for that distinction. The music is pure '60s-beat pop but the mumbled lyrics concern the "blue canary in the outlet by the lightswitch who watches over you." To their credit, Giants Flansburgh and Linnell make this ode to a night-light appealing. This is par for the course for They Might Be Giants. It seems as if the band writes songs only about topics no other artists would bother with composing.

"Istanbul (Not Constantinople)" casts the Giants as scholars of sorts. Over a hodge-podge of Middle-Eastern sounds, they offer a Turkish history lesson and warn if "you've got a date in Constantinople, she'll be waiting in Istanbul." Obviously the band is assuming many listeners will catch the underlying joke, but even if you're not overly familiar with the Ottoman Empire, the infectious song will hook you anyway.

It almost seems strange that a band like this has never written a song about themselves. "Flood" sees this oversight rectified. "They Might Be Giants" is a country stomp which insinuates that actually "they might be Dr. Spock's backup band." A mysterious voice pops up to warn "Hang on tight" while cartoonish horns blow in the background. Leave it to They Might Be Giants to write an ambiguous anthem.

Admirably, They Might Be Giants take on racism and make an memorable point by hitting home with "Your Racist Friend." "This is where the party ends," according to the duo. The song's narrator has to spend an evening listening to "some bullet-head and the madness that he's saying." Rather than overlooking the situation, he makes an impassioned plea to his companion "wondering how you can stand by your racist friend." The song is effective by humanizing the issue and bringing it to an identifiable level.

Despite the band's claim that "they might be big, big, fake, fake lies," "Flood" illustrates a sincerity towards They Might Be Giants' creations.

been gathered, do you?

■ King was at the press conference with the WBC and WBA officials. I'm sorry, but anyone who thinks the protest and the decision to uphold the title wasn't almost totally King's doing hasn't been around boxing enough to warrant listening to.

■ Finally, and possibly most convincingly, Tyson still had an opportunity to win the fight after the questionable eighth round, and he didn't get it done. He was knocked down and out, and there is no questioning that fact.

The last time I saw a similar deal go down, Andre the Giant was taking a title from Hulk Hogan with a referee who had been paid off tolling the count. Andre then gave his title to Ted DiBiase, and World Wrestling Federation President Jack Tunney held up the belt, pending investigation.

The result of all of this laughable stupidity was one of the WWF's Wrestlemania cards, designed only to make money and to help Hogan save face after he had "lost."

Sounding a bit familiar, yet? Let's face it, folks — Tyson got knocked out by a man who on this particular night was the better fighter. Maybe Meyran made a mistake. It did appear he was slow in his count, but he made the slowest 10 count on Tyson that I can remember seeing in quite some time.

But the biggest mistake was made by the buffoons who govern the WBC and WBA, who in their infinite wisdom took away something Douglas had earned — and all because of a human error. In so doing, they went against all precedent and threatened to wipe out in one fell swoop what Douglas had done only hours before — breathe new and needed life into a tired and questionable sport.

The WBC and WBA were handed a gift Sunday, and they threw it in the garbage. Maybe they should hop in the can with the referee while they're at it.

Violence justified: Mandela seeks apartheid end, supports guerilla campaigns

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Nelson Mandela said Monday he seeks a South Africa that is fair to both whites and blacks, and he insisted that violence against apartheid is justified.

The 71-year-old black leader, enjoying his first full day of freedom after 27 years in prison, defended the policies of his African National Congress but said talks with the government could be held soon.

In the tribal homeland of Ciskei, 10 blacks celebrating Mandela's release Sunday night were shot and killed by police, and 20 were injured, according to the Daily Dispatch newspaper in nearby East London. Homeland authorities refused to comment, and civil rights groups demanded a judicial inquiry.

In Mandela's hometown of Soweto, schools were deserted as thousands of students marched and danced in the streets, anticipating his return home. Believing Mandela was due back for an afternoon rally, tens of thousands of Sowetans crammed into a soccer stadium, and dozens were injured in the crush.

Hundreds of youths heading home from the stadium surrounded a police van and freed 13 prisoners inside, according to Gen.

Herman Stadler, a police spokesman. He said the officers in the vehicle decided not to use their firearms, and no injuries were reported.

The activists making arrangements for Mandela decided he should not re-enter Soweto until Tuesday, when a massive welcoming rally was planned. They refused to disclose where he would spend the night, although television networks deployed helicopters to pursue him.

"I am absolutely excited to be out," Mandela told reporters in Cape Town before taking an evening flight to Johannesburg. He was released unconditionally on Sunday.

Mandela said negotiations between the ANC and the government could begin "very soon" if President F.W. de Klerk continues his peace initiative and makes further reforms.

"The state of emergency has to be lifted in its entirety and political prisoners have to be released," Mandela told more than 200 journalists assembled on the lawn outside the official residence of Anglican Archbishop Desmond Tutu in Cape Town.

Andries Treurnicht, leader of the pro-apartheid Conservative Party, accused the government of falling victim to "Mandela hysteria" and moving toward white surrender. Eugene TerreBlanche, leader of the neo-Nazi Afrikaner Resistance Movement, said de Klerk is now powerless to control Mandela, and he warned that his movement "will protect itself and its property when the government can no longer do so."

Mandela said whites should not fear the prospect of an ANC-led government.

"Whites are fellow South Africans. We want them to feel safe," he said at his news conference. "The ANC... will find a solution that will suit both blacks and whites."

The ANC seeks a one-person, one-vote system, which would be dominated by South Africa's 28 million blacks. De Klerk seeks to negotiate a new constitution that would establish some political rights for blacks, but provide the 5 million whites with some sort of veto over major decisions.

Leader's release 'half a victory'

By Cosima Hadidi
Collegian Reporter

The release of Nelson Mandela after 27 years of imprisonment in South Africa caused many to rejoice. However, his release did not change the conditions of the country or the system of apartheid, said Clive Fullagar, assistant professor of psychology and former resident of South Africa.

"The release of Nelson Mandela is half a victory," said Lyno Martin, graduate student in agricultural education and citizen of Namibia. "Mandela walked out of prison as a free man, yet his country is still suffering from a state of emergency, apartheid laws and restrictions on its black citizens."

The purpose of Mandela's release by the South African government was to negotiate with him about changing the political conditions in the country, Fullagar said.

"But before any negotiations could take place, the basic building blocks of apartheid have to be dismantled, and Mandela's demand be met," he said.

Mandela has given two conditions before he would negotiate, the lifting of the state of emergency, and the release of all political prisoners, not just those who had been imprisoned because of their membership in formerly banned political parties such as the African National Congress, Fullagar said.

"I hope that these conditions aren't insurmountable stumbling blocks. But the government has expressed its willingness to negotiate with Mandela, so I cannot really see it refusing to lift the state of emergency since this would go against the purpose of all its previous promises," he said.

Police have reported about 40 deaths in unrest around the country since daybreak Sunday, including a clash between police and looters in Cape Town that left one black dead and more than 100 people injured.

Tutu, in an unusual move, issued a statement deploring the looting and refraining from criticism of the police. Other activists appealed to blacks to welcome Mandela in a dignified, non-violent manner.

At midday Monday, a white security guard in Johannesburg killed a man who was among a group of blacks that chased and cornered him.

Research lures away Schiappa

By The Collegian Staff

Schiappa, director of debate and assistant professor of speech, said the reason for his resignation was the result of his desire to devote more time to research.

"Coaching the debate team is very time-consuming and I would like to spend more time with teaching and research," Schiappa said. "It's purely a career choice."

He said the University had made a good counter-offer.

"It had nothing to do with salary," Schiappa said.

Harold Nichols, head of the speech department, said he had received Schiappa's resignation and was already beginning the search for a replacement.

"We're starting a search and we'll be sending out announcements at the end of this week," Nichols said.

"It's vital that we find a good replacement coach or we will lose some good debaters," Schiappa said.

Mary Keehner, assistant debate coach, said she also had announced her resignation. She said a formal letter of resignation would be given to the department later in the week.

"I have my master's, I need to get my Ph.D. and K-State doesn't have a doctoral program in speech," she said.

Keehner said the resignation of both coaches could hurt the debate team, but it could also be a time of opportunity.

"We're at a crossroads," she said. "It's potentially dangerous."

"The department understands we need to leave," Keehner said, "and it also understands that it needs good replacements."

Nichols said Schiappa will assist with the search for a new debate team coach.

Schiappa has coached K-State's debate team since the fall 1985.

In 1986, the team finished 80th in the national rankings. Under Schiappa's leadership, the team rose to 41st in 1987, 5th in 1988 and 3rd in 1989.

"The current rankings have us first in the nation," Schiappa said. "I'm confident we can hold that position at the end of the semester."

"It was a really hard choice to go somewhere else," he said. "I graduated from Manhattan High and I love the area, but it's time to move on."

Athletic department hit by cuts

By Steve Franzen
Staff Reporter

The widespread budget cuts affecting K-State have not excluded the KSU Athletic Department.

The department is actually a local agency only partially supported by state funds. The department raises a majority of its funds from ticket sales, television time, advertising and Big Eight Conference shares.

"A major difference is that money in athletics is not primarily University money, not state-proportioned money," Athletic Director Steve Miller said.

Miller said the cutbacks will be taken only from state-proportioned money, which is a minimal part of the total budget. The athletic department receives about $500,000 in state money in an overall budget of about $8 million.

"Things aren't always the way they appear," Miller said. "The misconceptions are incredible."

The $500,000 is split equally between salaries and the Other Operating Expenses fund. The positions supported by state monies are those of athletic director and the head men's and women's basketball coaches.

The athletic budget has increased only 3 percent in the last eight years. The department does not own Bramlage Coliseum, but rather pays one-third of maintenance and utility costs. It rents Bramlage for about $3,000 per game.

The department pays more than $1 million in room and board for 310 scholarship athletes each year. This distinguishes them as the largest K-State patron, Miller said.

The exact amount to be cut has not been disclosed to the department, said Paul Kowalczyk, athletic department business manager.

"We will take it from our Other Operating Expenses fund," Kowalczyk said. "I hope it will be as small as possible."

Kowalczyk said the department will not have to actually return any money, but rather will not receive as much from the University.

"The budget cuts affects us adversely, because we are part of the University as a whole," Athletic Director Steve Miller said. "We are going to participate at any level the administration asks us to participate."

He said the department will also abide by the hiring freeze on classified and unclassified employees that is in effect until July 1, after which it will consider looking for a head women's basketball coach and an assistant women's volleyball coach.

Senators discuss ASK fees

By Kirk Caraway
Collegian Reporter

Confusion over control of funds allocated to the Associated Students of Kansas by Student Senate has led to discussions concerning how the money will be spent.

The confusion is the result of a 15 cents-per-student increase of the ASK line item fee last spring. All ASK member institutions didn't pass the increase, so a separate account was established. The student body president and the ASK campus director have direct access to the account, without Senate approval.

"It was assumed everyone else would pass it," said Todd Johnson, student body president.

The fee was passed by all member institutions of ASK, except Wichita State University. Johnson said WSU has had problems with their ASK campus organization, which had six different directors last year.

"Their student government was in total turmoil last year," Johnson said.

The state ASK office is forbidden by its constitution to use any of the monies collected from the other schools. Because of this, ASK gave member schools who passed the increase the choice of taking the money back or keeping it in a separate ASK account to be used by them for lobbying activities.

Rules on who controls these accounts are unclear. Currently, ASK will release funds from these accounts if requested by the student body president. However, the request form used by K-State SGA also requires the signature of the ASK campus director.

Former student body president Laurian Cuffy used $202 from this account for ASK awareness week, but no written notice was given to Senate. Johnson said there are about $700 in bills left to pay from the ## Study findings adopted University may receive $3.1 million increase

By Tomari Guinn
Staff Reporter

The Senate Ways and Means Subcommittee recommended Monday the restoration of $5.7 million in cuts in the state universities' budgets as proposed by Gov. Mike Hayden.

The proposal would result in a total gain of about $3.1 million for the University, more than a 55 percent increase over the governor's budget.

Troy Lubbers, chairman of Associated Students of Kansas, said the recommendation is a launching pad for higher education in the state of Kansas.

"It gives us odds to shoot for — before, we had none," Lubbers said. "It's a good boost psychologically for the higher education community to see this."

Lubbers said although the budget adjustments will keep the University from slipping backwards, they will not advance it in comparison to other institutions.

One of the adjustments to Hayden's budget is the release of 75 percent of the general fee funds to the five institutions that had higher-than-anticipated enrollment in the fall of 1989. The institutions included K-State, the University of Kansas, Wichita State University, Emporia State University and Pittsburg State University.

The University would receive $752,635 from this proposal.

Lubbers said the University administration has worked extremely hard to get more students on campus, resulting in the need for more staff and teachers.

"They've recognized the fact that K-State has done an excellent job in attracting not only more students, but higher-quality students," he said. "Now they see we need the mechanism to give those students a quality

Rebels sink 9 Navy vessels

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP) — Eritrean rebels said Monday they sank nine Navy vessels and captured 46 tanks in three assaults on the Red Sea port of Massawa in northern Ethiopia.

The Eritrean People's Liberation Front said 21 crew and a large but unspecified number of army personnel also were taken prisoner during the siege.

The rebels said "fierce" fighting was continuing in a separate attack they launched Sunday east of Karan, 55 miles west of Massawa.

It was not possible to independently confirm the rebel claims made in a statement issued in Khartoum, Sudan, where the Eritrean Front maintains an office.

In Addis Ababa, the government issued no more information on the fighting after saying Sunday its troops and the rebels were battling for control of Massawa.

Cult member dies of AIDS

MEXICO CITY (AP) — Omar Francisco Orea Ochoa, a member of a cult accused of committing ritual slayings along the U.S.-Mexico border, has died of a heart attack brought on by AIDS, the Mexico City attorney general's office said Monday.

The government said he died of a heart attack Sunday afternoon in the hospital at Mexico City's Santa Marta Acatitla federal penitentiary. Dr. Francisco Guerra Izquierdo at the hospital said the cardiac arrest was caused by AIDS.

Orea Ochoa, 24, was diagnosed as having the deadly disease in June, the attorney general's office said.

Before joining the cult, he was a journalism student at Mexico's National University.

Orea Ochoa reportedly was the lover of Adolfo de Jesus Constanzo, the Cuban-born leader of the cult. Orea Ochoa was one of five cult members arrested May 6, when Constanzo ordered his own killing and that of another man when police began closing in on them in Mexico City.

Donald, Ivana Trump split

NEW YORK (AP) — Monday's big news in the gossip-hungry Big Apple, overshadowing Mandela's freedom and Tyson's fight, was the separation of Ivana and Donald Trump, the billionaire developer who had the foresight to perfect the art of the prenuptial deal.

According to columnist Liz Smith, who broke the story in Sunday's Daily News, the prenuptial agreement has been updated four times in the 12-year marriage, the last time two years ago.

If the split sticks, Ivana gets $25 million, plus their Greenwich, Conn., mansion and custody of the three children.

"The Donald," as Ivana affectionately called him in happier times, keeps everything else — a business and real estate empire worth somewhere from $1.7 billion to $4 billion, depending on who's counting.

Trump was back in town Monday after witnessing another shocker — James "Buster" Douglas' knockout of boxing champ Mike Tyson in Tokyo. According to Smith, Trump's comment on that debacle was: "He fought a bad fight and the other guy fought a brilliant fight."

But the author of the bestselling "The Art of the Deal" wasn't making himself available for comment, spokesmen said, leaving Smith's jet- and car-phone conversations as the latest word.

Judge refuses to drop fines

LEBANON, Va. (AP) — A state judge refused Monday to drop $64 million in fines against the United Mine Workers, raising new doubt about the future of a tentative settlement by 1,700 miners in three states.

The strike against Pittston Coal Group spread far beyond that one company last summer, when thousands of miners staged wildcat sympathy strikes.

The UMW and Pittston reached a tentative agreement Jan. 1, but union leaders said they wouldn't put the contract to a vote of the rank and file until all legal action connected with the strike is settled.

Both the union and the company had asked Circuit Court Judge Donald McGlothlin to drop the fines, but on Monday he refused. The judge gave the union an additional 10 days to come up with new arguments in favor of dropping the fines, imposed for a variety of illegal strike activities.

UWM General Counsel Robert Stropp said union leaders would reassess their decision to withhold a vote on the tentative contract. Asked if there may be a vote even if McGlothlin upholds the fines, Stropp said, "I think that is going to have to be part of the assessment."

The union has said it would appeal a decision to impose the fines.

The union offered to have its 1,700 striking miners in Virginia, West Virginia and Kentucky perform 10,000 hours of community service over 30 days if the fines are waived. McGlothlin rejected the offer Monday, calling it, "an affront to this court."

Fake drug deal breaks record

WICHITA (AP) — Federal charges were filed Monday against three Californians following the seizure of more than $200,000 they allegedly paid an undercover agent as part of a phony drug deal.

The money, mostly in $100 bills, is the largest cash seizure ever made in a Kansas drug case, said U.S. Attorney Lee Thompson.

Authorities said the previous record was $141,000 in a federal case being handled in Topeka.

If the three people charged are convicted and forfeiture proceedings go as expected, the approximately $212,000 will be divided among the agencies involved in the Drug Enforcement Administration Task Force in Wichita for use in other drug investigations.

Charged in the case were Ward S. Shideler Jr., 50, and his wife, Anna M. Shideler, 48, both of Somerset, Calif.; and Joseph D. Lewis, 46, of Fresno, Calif.

They each face one count of attempting to possess with intent to distribute more than 100 kilograms of marijuana. U.S. Magistrate John B. Wooley ordered them held without bail Monday and set another hearing for Wednesday.

Renovations inconvenient for residents

By Joann Beckman
Collegian Reporter

Boyd and Putnam Hall residents learned at an meeting Monday about renovation and construction on Van Zile Hall and how it is affecting them.

Rosanne Proite, assistant director of housing, said some Boyd and Putnam residents have complained about the inconveniences caused by the construction.

The noise of jackhammers and drills have been waking people early in the morning, but Proite said the use of jackhammers should stop by Wednesday.

"Probably the biggest inconvenience has been the fact that with the fencing, students have had to walk all the way around Boyd and Putnam," she said. "This is especially uncomfortable after dark."

"We've put new and additional lights up on the exterior of Boyd and Putnam, but it's still dark."

Most of the residents in Boyd and Putnam halls are learning to live with the situation, she said.

The first floor of the renovated Van Zile Hall will house the hall director's apartment, a reception area and the food service for the Strong Complex, which includes Boyd, Putnam and Van Zile, said Barbara Brooks, manager of Boyd Hall Food Service. She will be the manager of the Strong Complex Food Service next year.

The second and third floors of Van Zile will house student rooms, Proite said.

Patience Cozadd, senior in interior design, is designing the Van Zile interior. She said all student rooms and corridors will be carpeted and furnished with new fixtures.

Corner rooms on the south side of the second floor of Van Zile may be made handicapped accessible because of their proximity to the elevator and the chairs in their showers, he said.

"Most of the handicapped accessible rooms are for singles," Burgess said. "Unless, of course, an individual needs to have someone there to help them."

Van Zile will be a co-ed residence hall with a maximum occupancy of 67 residents, he said. The male-to-female ratio will not exceed 55 percent in favor of either sex.

Space for a convenience store will be included in the basement, Proite said. The convenience store, which will be operated by housing, will not be built immediately because of lack of funds.

Rod Evans, the superintendent for Buildings Systems Co., said air conditioning will be installed in Boyd, Putnam and Van Zile. Work on the installation of the air conditioners will begin after students leave Boyd and Putnam this spring, he said.

The completion date for the renovation of Van Zile is Aug. 6, Evans said.

Proposal gives voters power of amendment

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Two senators who have been highly critical of statewide reappraisal and the organization that has led property tax protests endorsed a measure Monday that would allow voters to place constitutional amendments on the ballot through petition initiatives.

"This gives the power to the people," Sen. Phil Martin, D-Pittsburg, told the Senate Elections Committee. Martin is one of the bill's seven sponsors.

However, critics of the measure said that such an amendment would give the power to the moneyed lobbyist who could mount the largest media blitz.

Under the present system, constitutional amendments can be put on the ballot by the Legislature, with two-thirds votes of both houses, or through a constitutional convention.

Under the proposal, the signatures of 10 percent of the people who cast votes in the last governor's election would be enough to put an amendment on the ballot. It would take 84,061 signatures based on the total number of votes cast for governor in 1986.

Martin said the Legislature, in its effort to resolve the property tax issue, is stymied because any proposal to change a property classification amendment adopted in 1986 requires two-thirds majorities before it can go to voters. That means 27 votes in the 40-member Senate and 84 votes in the 125-member House.

"That number is very difficult to get," Martin said. "It may take an extra impetus of something like this to relieve the logjams."

In a lengthy presentation, Sen. Ed Reilly, R-Leavenworth, said initiative provisions can be found in the constitutions of 23 states.

Lemon Drops left behind by openers at Lawrence club

Mark
Butler

REVIEW

The "Laughter" tour hit Lawrence Sunday night and, although not living up to its name, it did serve as a vehicle for three diverse artists.

The bands featured on the tour were the Mighty Lemon Drops, the Ocean Blue and solo artist John Wesley Harding.

British folk singer John Wesley Harding walked upon The Bottleneck stage as a relative unknown, but quickly was preaching to a converted sell-out crowd. Harding's self-effacing introduction of "Hi, I'm the Indigo Girls," immediately informed the crowd of his theory that folk music need not be serious or dull. Actually, Harding came across as a comic who also happened to be singing about society's ills.

Harding's first song came across as a personal manifesto and set an acerbic tone for his brief, manic set.

Harding seemingly found more faults with the entertainment world than with the world in general. Apparently, Harding is plagued by nightmares about pop stars, or so he claims. Vitriolic banter regarding Phil Collins' chest hair prefaced a rollicking ode to "the day we watched Live Aid," the massive Ethiopian benefit concert.

The singer celebrated the unity of the event while attacking some of the commercial motives involved. He even went so far as to tack on a rendition of "We Own The World" in which he advised the audience not to sing along because "you don't know the words."

Harding closed his set of witty banter, in-jokes and frenetic guitar playing by relating a businessman's view of a Beatles' reunion including John Lennon, "suddenly the quiet Beatle."

The next band was the current college rave, the Ocean Blue. The wall-to-wall crowd seemed to know the band, whose debut album was released only a few months ago, inside out.

If ever a band's name perfectly summed it up, the Ocean Blue is that band.

The Ocean Blue is already very accomplished. Vocalist and guitarist David Schelzel served as the focal point for the band. The crystalline tones of his guitar playing complemented keyboardist Steve Lau's simple but full textures to create a big sound that splashed out of the public address system. Lau's occasional saxophone playing gave some gently loping songs a tropical flavor. The rhythm tandem of Bobby Mittan and Rob Mining moved the songs steadily forward especially through Mittan's clear, succinct bass lines.

Gaining the crowd's approval was almost a given for the band. The mere presence of the four, who looked like J. Crew catalog models, evoked screams of delight. To add to their charm, the Hershey, Penn., natives threw chocolate kisses to the awestruck crowd.

Highlights of the performance were fittingly some of the group's best-known songs. The Ocean Blue played to its own strengths quite cunningly. "Between Something and Nothing" and "Drifting, Falling" garnered loud applause upon recognition and upon completion. The celebratory "Just Let Me Know" and the joyous "Love Song" also demonstrated the Ocean Blue's verve and ability.

By the time the Mighty Lemon Drops mounted the stage, it had two winning performances to top and audience fatigue to battle. Despite a strong sound and some winning material, the Drops proved to be a slight disappointment.

The Wolverhampton, England, natives have matured a great deal since their American debut in 1986. They have added some depth through increased musical proficiency and the introduction of keyboards to their sound. Unfortunately, they have lost some direction in their songs, as was evidenced by some nondescript newer material.

Leather-clad vocalist Paul Marsh commanded the attention of the crowd immediately, probably because the rest of the Drops were content to hide behind him for the majority of the set.

The Drops' new album "Laughter" has definitely been named in irony. Their expanded sound is a dense thicket of guitars and minimal keyboards. Most of the new songs seemed to suffer from a gloomy outlook.

Perhaps in recognition of the weaknesses of the new material, the band concentrated on stronger, earlier songs. "Happy Head," from the band's first album, was the first to cause a buzz through the packed hall. Other archival material, such as "All The Way" and "The Other Side of You" kept interest high, but was "Inside Out," the band's MTV hit from its second album which was a definitive highlight.

Overall, the Mighty Lemon Drops was not bad. Its only problem was a lack of forward movement in style. The newer songs also seemed to be diminished by a lack of interest from the band.

Changes shown in unique perspective

Anticipation! Apprehension! My plane is approaching the Hamburg airport after a long trip from Kansas. Home for Christmas to see my family again! Thoughts race through my head. I remember when the Berlin Wall was built. I remember the tragedy of families separated from each other. The people who were shot trying to escape. The packages my family packed for our relatives in Jena ... did not arrive. And how we used to ask ourselves ... will the Wall ever come down?

Well — it has! What will things be like? I travel back to new things in my country. But the immigrants from the east, pouring into West Germany enter the unknown, too. Me and the East Germans — strangers in paradise!

Yes, the East Germans think West Germany is a Maerchenland — a fabulous, fairytale country where the streets are paved with gold. And nothing seems to change their opinion. Already, 350,000 have immigrated from East Germany and so have another 350,000 ethnic Germans from other countries! You may have been born in Romania and lived there all your life. But, if your grandmother was a German — Willkommen! — and bring the wife and kids! For every immigrant, 1,800 deutsche marks and social benefits. The first arrivals got jobs. But now, unemployment is nine percent and a million people need housing. No, Germany is not a fairyland.

On the ground — at last! Happy chatter in a busy airport. Over the Lautsprecher, an announcement — the Lufthansa flight to Dresden delayed. "Lufthansa flies to Dresden?" My brother: "Leipzig auch." Things have changed!

On the Autobahn to Hannover. Family talk ... traffic ... noise ... We pass a big billboard. A radiant, smiling woman says, "Offene Grenzen geben offene Herzen." So open borders open the heart, do they? In my experience, the best way to open a German's heart is to drop money into his pocket.

We pass a funny little car. "What's that?" "A Trabi, an East German car. Only two cylinders. Aber es geht." Yes, it goes. The man is hunched over the steering wheel, staring grimly ahead, paying no attention to the big cars whizzing past him in the fast lane. Well — so? He'll be in Cologne before he sleeps.

Home at last! Talk — talk — talk. Jet lag. What's on the television?

Chancellor Kohl making a speech — "Die deutsche Frage ist nur unter einem europäischen Dach Europas zu lösen." And again: "Deutschland ist unser Vaterland, Europa ist unsere Zukunft."

Well! Maybe Germany is our Fatherland but Europe is our future, and maybe the Germans really do want to live under the roof of Europe. But people from the East arrive here with very different ideas. It is not Europe they are coming to — but Germany. They are intoxicated — delirious — with the idea of freedom! Freiheit ueber alles!

Big concert on the TV after Christmas. Leonard Bernstein conducts Beethoven's 9th from the big, new concert hall in East Berlin. I love the choral section best — "Freude schoener Gotterfunken, Tochter aus Elysium —" But what do I hear? "Freiheit schoener Gotterfunken —!" All through the choral section "Freude" (Joy) is replaced by "Freiheit" (freedom). Lenny Bernstein brings Beethoven up to date!

My brother is cautious: "They think things are easy over here. But in East Germany, they had guaranteed jobs, guaranteed housing, medical care — cradle to grave. Over here you can lose your job, your savings, your apartment, unless you work in a productive way. Not just to punch a time clock and stand around. What has 40 years of Communism done to the old German spirit of free enterprise and hard work? They don't know what they're getting into."

"Ein Ritt in das Ungewisse?" Certainly, a trip into the unknown!

""Stimmt." New Year's Eve on TV: Mass celebration in Berlin — 500,000 people walking through the city. Champagne — noise — entertainers. David Hasselhoff, an American, sings "Looking for Freedom" and "Flying on the Wings of Tenderness." School choirs use their young voices to sing songs of freedom into the cold night air.

My brother: "There's going to be trouble. I can feel it. A new kind of struggle — but a struggle, nevertheless. The East Germans want to unite with us. Ein Volk! What do they care about Europe? But most of us lean toward Europe, Common Market — England, France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Italy — and all the rest.

Comment in a newspaper: Die DDR und die BDR gehoeren zum gleichen Kulturkreis und was zusammengehoert wird zusammen wachsen aber nicht zusammenwuchern.

Yes, I agree. East and West Germany come from the same cultural heritage, and what belongs together will flourish, but should not, together, overproliferate.

My last night in Germany. In the railroad station in Hannover — the big posters in their cases — Ankunft und Abfahrt — listing the arrivals and departures of the trains, covered all over with pieces of paper pasted on them announcing the new train schedules to and from the towns and cities of East Germany. What hysteria in the sacred Hauptquartier of the Deutsche Bundesbahn, as they search desperately for more trains to accommodate the sudden crowds of people who want to travel from West to East, and from East to West!

And then, a short walk down Rathenau Strasse to the fine old Hannover Opera House on the Opernplatz. How long has it been there?

Inside, the excitement before the curtain goes up on Der Rosenkavalier. How many people in the audience are from East Germany? Czechoslovakia? Romania? Hungary? Poland? But do borders really matter? We all laugh, and clap our hands in the presence of one of the most beautiful operas of our time. Written by an Austrian poet, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, set to music by a Munich composer, Richard Strauss and first performed by the ensemble of the Hofoper in Dresden, Der Rosenkavalier is not something that can be hemmed in by fences. As long as Germans can experience their art everywhere their language is spoken, and even in places where it isn't, no one who crosses a border really takes a trip into the unknown.

Environmental issues need closer attention

President Bush refuses to recognize a war that has existed since the industrial revolution — the economy vs. the environment.

Bush's fluff-filled speech last week to an international environmental conference served no purpose. He only managed to bore environmentalists. His speech bared no significant policies to aid the preservation of the earth. Bush spoke on politics, not environmental issues. His hot air only added to the problem of global warming.

Poorly versed and ill-rehearsed, Bush's call for arms against global warming and pollution was nothing more than a weak attempt to pacify environmentalists.

He said politics have outpaced science. If that were true, there wouldn't be the threats of global warming and a greenhouse effect. He has failed to realize that conservation and environmental safety procedures must be practiced by industries worldwide.

Science, technology and industry are growing faster than society can comprehend. At Bush's rate, by the time any sort of policy is made to deal with environmental damage, the methods will be obsolete and the damage to the atmosphere will be too extensive to reverse.

Pollution controls and other safety regulations must be implemented immediately to provide significant relief for the environment. This must be done in spite of the threat of economic disruption. Bush must decide what is more important — economic growth or the ability to breathe.

Name changes offered

When I heard the University for Man was changing its name, my first thought was, "What the hell for?" University for Man is a great name. It rings of achievement, better societies, intellect and variety. University for Man is a name that sounds wonderful — like that famous speech beamed from the moon in 1969.

The word "man," like many words in this confusing language of ours, has several meanings. The first, of course, is "a male human being." Other meanings are colloquial forms of address or expressions of awe. The second most common definition for "man," I thought, is simply, "the human species." UFM wants to change its name because, to some people, the current name connotes a limited spectrum of classes and interests.

Several things went through my head. If the name was University for a Man, or University for Men, I could see why people would get upset. The fact that the name simply states "for Man," and does not include the indefinite article "a," should make clear the intended definition of "man."

Even if people did not know the full range of definitions for "man," it seems illogical, or possibly illegal, that there would be an organization which catered only to males, other than fraternities and the like. I looked up the word in Webster's II New Riverside University Dictionary to see if my understanding of the word was wrong. And, to my surprise, I was not wrong — Webster's lists all the aforementioned definitions.

But Webster's also acknowledges that "the use of man in its primary sense of 'an adult male human being' makes this term unacceptable to many ... (when used as) 'a human being, regardless of sex.'" Webster's further states that consequently, other terms have come to be used in the language instead of "man."

I stood corrected. If Webster's says the word is outdated, then it is outdated.

And some of you thought this was another "damn sexist article." Shame on you. You know who you are, too, so don't deny it.

UFM is changing its name. It is inviting K-State students, Manhattan residents, high school students and middle school students to suggest a new name. Five awards of 20 Susan B. Anthony dollars will be distributed. One award goes to the first person to suggest the name that is finally selected. And the four best essays of 250 words or less, on a topic related to UFM, will receive awards as well. For the essays, one individual from each of the above four groups will be recognized.

Details about the name search can be found on page three of the UFM catalog.

So what should be the new UFM name? To equal or better the current name will be quite a challenge. UFM has become almost a household word in the community. Although it is not necessary, it would be nice if the new name would correspond to the current initials.

Just as some people still say "Master Charge" instead of "Master Card," and "Kleenex" instead of "Always Save Facial Tissue," some will probably always say "UFM" even if the initials change. This makes name creation even more difficult, but it will be an interesting challenge.

I like to pretend I'm a writer, and writers like to play with words. So I perused the dictionary to find words that started with UFM, and would benefit UFM's purpose. Following are some ideas, some of which are serious, some not. I don't claim any copyrights, so anyone may use them and take the credit if they so desire.

It seems like the "U" word should start with "uni-," as that would indicate one-ness. The "F" section of the dictionary is pretty short, and there aren't many "F" words that sound positive. So it looks like the challenge lies in finding the perfect "M" word.

To start, here is my suggestion of the century: University for the Mind.

Universal Free Mission or United Free Mecca also sound good. A mecca is a place held to be the center of activity or interest. And UFM is a "free university." Incidentally, Webster's provides all the definitions in this column. (You know, I've got to cover my rear in regard to plagiarism.)

Other possibilities include United Future Mentalities, or Mentalism, or University for the Masses, or the Multitude?

How about University from Mars, University for Me, Underwaged Fanatical Millionaires? Or we could try University for Most, or Many, or Mammoths or Maniacs. We could call it University for Minor Prophets. Maybe we could combine the things we like the most, and call it UFMOE: University for the Margin of Excellence.

Here is one that sounds stupid at first, but has quite a meaning underneath — University for Macrobiotics. That means longevity. It would indicate the concept of "life through learning." Possibly University for the Macrocosm would work as well, but it is kind of redundant.

Here's one: Macroevolution. It refers to evolution of the entire species. That might work. But then, which species?

University for Flagrant Mind-enhancement. Ah, no. University for Maturity might work, but it could be interpreted to mean only senior citizens. Perhaps the word "maturation" could be used.

Or how about Latin: Universitas Multifaris — the diverse school. Ah, here we go — Universitas Maximus. Now that is a grand name. It conveys greatness, wide interest, and has an important ring to it. Then again, it kind of sounds like Circus Maximus. That might make the Christians worried — remember the Romans? — or was that the Colosseum? At any rate, people would probably think, "Universitas Maximus ... Circus Maximus ... Really Big Circle Dude!"

Get involved. UFM needs suggestions, and you just might earn $20 for your trouble.

Derby's 'Bakery' provides students variety of treats

By The Collegian Staff

What once was a coat closet has become a popular hangout for students. It is now a place to purchase chocolate chip cookies, brownies, cinnamon rolls, blueberry muffins and other goods.

The Bakery, located in the Derby Food Center, opened in fall 1987 with three main objectives, said Mary Molt, assistant director of food service.

It was established by the Derby staff because students expressed an interest in such a facility, Molt said. The second objective was to create more campus jobs for students, and the third was to allow students to gain work experience related to their majors.

Sales average around 2,000 items a week, said Sharon Remmert, supervisor.

"The Bakery is not concerned with being a profit center, but instead concentrates on what jobs and products it can offer the students," Molt said. "Any profits made are not added to anyone's paycheck, but are re-invested in The Bakery."

Most of The Bakery's employees are students, including the manager and the accountant, Remmert said. The Bakery employs about 20 student workers and two full-time civil service workers.

The full-time employees do all of the mixing and most of the baking, while the students mainly work behind the counter and decorate cakes, Remmert said.

Remmert said most of the mixing and baking is done in the Derby kitchen behind The Bakery. The quantity of foods produced requires large equipment available in the kitchen.

Remmert said The Bakery is striving to serve good, quality food while offering friendly service. She said the staff is always looking for more ways to improve and to satisfy their customers.

"One idea I'd like to try in the future would be to have a little box for students to submit recipes from home," Remmert said.

Remmert said they could then select appropriate student recipes to make and sell at The Bakery, while advertising who submitted the recipe.

One service the staff has been expanding is special promotions, Remmert said. The Bakery tries to offer promotions, such as cookie tins and baskets, which coordinate with different holidays.

The Bakery sends letters to the parents of Derby Complex residents, offering decorated birthday cakes which can be ordered through the mail and then delivered to the students, Remmert said.

Pat Pesci, director of Derby, said the birthday cake promotion has been a positive thing with parents. He said he expects promotions to grow and more specialized services to be offered.

Tina McKinzie, freshman in dietetics, is one of the students who work at The Bakery decorating cakes. She said she enjoys working there because it relates to her major.

Nuclear unrest arises

Senator asks Soviets for 'fail-safe' review

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, concerned over whose finger stays on the button of the Soviet Union's 30,000 nuclear weapons in a time of internal tumult, is proposing that the Kremlin mount a "fail-safe" review of controls on its nuclear arsenals.

Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., also wants the United States to conduct such an independent review of its own safeguards against the unauthorized or accidental launch of nuclear weapons and says his committee will do the job if the Pentagon fails to act.

With ethnic and political tensions straining Soviet unity, many American military experts and key congressional figures are fretting about the possibility that a nuclear missile could be unleashed on the world without the knowledge or approval of the Kremlin.

"My worst-case fear for the last several months is that we would wake up one morning and discover that an ethnic liberation front had obtained control of 100 nuclear weapons," said a military expert on the staff of the House Armed Services Committee.

"Nuclear weapons are in every Soviet republic that is potentially rebellious," said the source, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"It's a legitimate problem to worry about," he said. "I'm not having nightmares about it. Stealing a nuclear weapon is not a simple thing to do. We know you can't just walk into a Soviet missile silo and fire them."

But he added the equation might change if an ethnic faction seized control of an entire province.

Bruce G. Blair of the Brookings Institution notes that the Soviets may have 100 or so nuclear weapons stored near Baku, in Soviet Azerbaijan, site of recent violent clashes between Moslem Azerbaijanis and Christian Armenians.

Until Soviet troops entered Baku to restore order, widespread reports had gunmen seizing conventional arms and ammunition from Soviet depots.

"It's a concern people are paying attention to, trying to monitor," Blair said. "I think the Soviets themselves are so concerned about this problem that they're handling it just fine."

Ethnic violence flared again Monday, this time in the predominantly Moslem Asian republic of Tadzhikistan. Soviet authorities reported rioting in the capital city of Dushanbe, with mobs angry over rumors that Armenian refugees were getting preferential treatment. There were deaths and dozens of injuries and reports of looting before authorities declared a state of emergency and imposed a curfew.

The issue of control over nuclear weapons may soon be explored in extraordinary public fashion, at a time the superpowers apparently are nearing agreement on several arms control accords.

Yevgeni Velikhov, chairman of the Supreme Soviet's defense subcommittee, proposes an unprecedented joint hearing with the House Armed Services Committee to explore ways of reducing the danger of unauthorized or accidental launches of nuclear weapons.

Rep. Les Aspin, D-Wis., chairman of the House panel, says he is open to the idea of a joint meeting, leaving the topic of such a session to be settled later.

Gorbachev may inhibit unity

Soviet president tells East Germans reunified country may not join NATO

By The Associated Press

WEST BERLIN — Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev told East German leaders that a reunited Germany cannot belong to the NATO alliance, the East German news agency reported on Monday.

The Soviet leader's stand is strongly at odds with the United States and Western European nations, who oppose the idea of a neutral Germany with no ties to the Western military alliance.

East Germany, meanwhile, rejected a West German proposal to quickly merge the currencies of the two Germanys, but did approve the principle of a single currency.

West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl, trying to speed the push toward reunification, had urged a quick monetary union to ease what he said was a critical economic crisis in East Germany.

East German leaders on Monday asked the West Germans for financial aid of up to $9 billion, but West Germany rejected the request. Finance Minister Theo Waigel said it made "no sense" to provide funds to a "system that has still not decided to make fundamental changes and has not shown it is capable of doing so."

About 70,000 East Germans turned out Monday evening for the weekly pro-democracy rally in Leipzig. Dozens carried West German flags and one banner read: "If the West German mark comes, we'll stay. If the West German mark doesn't show up, we'll go to join it."

Kohl and Hans Modrow, East Germany's Communist premier, are to meet in Bonn on Tuesday. In Brussels, foreign ministers of the European Community said Kohl would make Modrow an official offer of monetary union.

They said Waigel mentioned the plan at a meeting of EC ministers Monday. No details were released.

Kohl said he got the "green light" for unification from Gorbachev during a weekend visit to Moscow, but the official East German agency ADN reported Monday the Soviet leader insisted a united Germany stay out of NATO.

The chancellor has said repeatedly that West Germany is firmly in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and has rejected neutrality for a single Germany.

ADN said Gorbachev told Modrow by telephone he had "clearly told" Kohl a "united Germany staying within the structure of NATO cannot be accepted."

Gorbachev said the "question of military structures and questions of political status can only be solved in a gradual transition," the agency reported.

Its dispatch gave no details on Gorbachev's position about the Western military alliance, but said he acknowledged German unity could come "more quickly than previously thought." ADN indicated Gorbachev initiated the conversation with Modrow.

In Washington, President Bush said, "We support Chancellor Kohl's position that a unified Germany should remain a member of NATO. Let me also express my appreciation of Chairman Gorbachev's statesmanlike view that decisions regarding German unity should be left to the people of Germany."

Kohl has denied West Germany wants to "annex" the East, but comments from East Berlin indicate growing resentment to pressure from Bonn.

At the weekly talks Monday between the government and other organizations, a set of guidelines was approved for Modrow's meeting with Kohl.

Most important was rejection of speedy action toward the single currency Kohl says is necessary to bolster the East German economy.

No. 1 KU, No. 2 Mizzou set for battle

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — The suggestion that No. 2 Missouri has more incentive than No. 1 Kansas in the biggest regular-season game in Big Eight history makes Roy Williams laugh.

"Regardless of what the polls say, the last time we played, they won," the Kansas coach said Monday. "We're the ones who better have the incentive."

The two neighboring states began battling one another in athletic competition almost 100 years ago, not long after taking opposite sides in the Civil War. Last month, when then-No. 4 Missouri beat then-No. 1 Kansas, 95-87, it was hailed as one of their grandest encounters ever.

But another century may pass before anything develops that's quite so big or nationally acclaimed as the rematch Tuesday at 6:40 p.m. in Kansas' tradition-rich Allen Fieldhouse. More than 200 media representatives, about double the number who covered last year's Missouri-Kansas tilt, will join fans in the sold-out arena. "We've been putting in extra chairs and tables," said a school spokesman. "People are really going to be crunched-up. Some students have been camping outside the fieldhouse since last Friday to get tickets. Where there wasn't any grass, they put up tents on concrete."

Kansas (24-1 overall, 7-1 Big Eight) was No. 1 for two weeks before losing at Missouri (22-2, 8-1), which had held the top spot for three weeks until losing last Thursday at K-State.

There hasn't been a 1-2 showdown in the regular basketball season in four years. There has never been a time when Big Eight teams played each other while ranked No. 1 and 2 in the Associated Press poll.

"I think it's great for the Big Eight, the interest and the attention we're getting," Williams said. "People are now seeing some evidence of the kind of basketball we play here."

"I can't remember two ballclubs, particularly with the traditional rivalry we have, playing two games under these conditions," said Missouri's Norm Stewart, the dean of Big Eight coaches. "The last one was a great ballgame and lived up to the hype. Hopefully, we'll have another great ballgame."

Other league coaches believe a game to remember is a foregone conclusion.

"Missouri's got a very unique club," said Nebraska Coach Danny Nee. "Anthony Peeler and Doug Smith are two of the finest in the country — great, great players. And John McIntyre, Nathan Buntin and Lee Coward do a great job of complementing them.

"Everybody's still waiting for Kansas to flame out," Nee added. "But they're a great team offensively and defensively. It all makes for a great game."

Last month against Kansas, the Tigers got 24 points from Peeler, their spectacular sophomore guard, and 23 from Smith, a 6-10 senior who had 44 on Saturday against Nebraska. In addition, Buntin had 22 and Coward had 20 in handing the Jayhawks their lone loss of the season.

Kansas, unranked at the beginning of the season, got 18 points from Mark Randall, and 16 from Kevin Priehard and Rick Calloway.

Stewart is hoping for another big effort from Buntin and Smith.

"We need a good inside ballgame from them," he said. "We need a good rebounding job. At the same time, it's not all on their shoulders."

If the Jayhawks hold an edge, it's their home court, where just two years ago they ended a 55-game winning streak.

"The difference in the last game was the home court," Stewart said. "It's going to be an extremely difficult challenge."

Kansas coach Roy Williams and his Jayhawks will get their first chance to defend their latest No. 1 ranking when No. 2 Missouri and Coach Norm Stewart invade Allen Fieldhouse tonight. Tip-off is set for 6:40 p.m.

Henson shouldn't be brunt of Wildcat hoop fans' excuses

Chris Hays

IT'S JUST MADNESS

It was only a matter of time before a reporter, who shall remain nameless, made the mistake of referring to this season as an off-year for K-State point guard Steve Henson.

And the mere reference was not the big mistake. But making the reference in front of one of Henson's biggest allies was.

"Hey now. I think that's a pretty loaded question," interrupted Lon Kruger Thursday night, when Henson was asked if he was back to the Henson of old after K-State defeated Missouri, and the McPherson native had scored all of his 18 points in the second half.

"He may not be shooting the ball as well this year, but I think Steve's having a great season. I'm not going to trade him."

The fact of the matter is that many people may have expected too much of Henson this year.

Nobody really knew how the rest of the K-State players would pan out this year — just that Henson was supposed to be the Big Eight's pre-season player of the year.

What people seemed to forget when all of the expectations were being handed out was that Henson had never really had to do it all himself in the past. It's a bit easier to get things done and acquire some attention in the process, when there are other people on the team garnering attention as well.

What people had come to expect from Henson was that he did whatever it was he had to do.

During his freshman year, his job was to get the ball in the hands of Norris Coleman and Mitch Richmond, and he did so to the tune of nearly four assists per game.

When his sophomore year rolled around, Coleman was gone, but Richmond was still around to take an assist or two, and Henson improved his handouts to nearly six per game, while also averaging nine points.

But then, Richmond was gone last season, and Henson would be expected to shoot it a little more, as well as try to keep up his assist production. Well, Fred McCoy and LaKeith Humphrey made the offensive burden a little easier to take, and Henson was able to maintain his assist production, while also getting in on the scoring act himself, leading the team with an 18.5-point average.

His court prowess and the success that has surrounded Henson throughout his career quite possibly could have been his own worst enemy this season — that is as far as expectations go.

Henson's roles were fairly well-defined until this season. In the past, everyone knew what he had to do, so, naturally, with so many newcomers this season, everybody just knew that Henson was going to do what he had before — adjust to whatever was thrown his way.

Well, I'm pretty tired of hearing from all kinds of different people, "What's wrong with Steve Henson?" "Why can't Henson hit his free throws?" and so on, and so on, with the most bogus answer to all of the questions being, "It's because he got married."

That statement should make anybody who knows Henson cringe.

To charge that Henson has lost his drive and will-to-win just because he got married prior to the season is absolutely asinine.

I have yet to meet anyone who has more drive or out-and-out will-to-win than Steve Henson, and for someone to claim that he is having an off season is just someone looking for a place to put the blame on an atypical rollercoaster year for Wildcat hoops.

To begin with, Henson has only missed two more free throws than he did last year, and he is hitting at an 87 percent clip from the line. And to say

Storm breaks 1,000-meter record

Strong City freshman sets mark in 1st race

By Dan Wicker
Sports Reporter

Coach John Capriotti's K-State distance corps has struck again. This time it is, yet again, a freshman.

Jared Storm turned in the first K-State record-breaking performance of the indoor track season Saturday at the competitive Husker Invitational, placing third in the 1,000 meters with a Wildcat-record time of 2:25.62.

What makes Storm's performance unusual is the fact that it was the first time he had ever run the 1,000 meters, and he said he was surprised.

"I had no concept of what a good time was or what the record was," Storm said. "I just wanted to run good."

Capriotti said he was not surprised by Storm's performance and that the freshman has the ability to be one of the best runners K-State has ever had.

"He is a pretty talented and pretty tough competitor," Capriotti said. "He has the ability. Just give him time to get healthy and develop."

Storm was sitting in fifth place on the Big Eight honor roll last week in the 800 meters with a time of 1:52.25, and with his 1,000-meter time, he will jump into the second-place slot on the conference charts in that event.

Storm comes to K-State by way of Scott City High School where he was the Class 4A 800-meter champion. In only his first year of college competition he said he is still trying to get used to the training and transition from high school, but realizes he enjoys college much more.

"(The transition from high school to college) was tough at first," Storm said. "College is more of a job. It is more up to you and you have more freedom. I like it a lot better than high school."

Capriotti said he attributes most of his first-season success to the fall conditioning program Storm was met with when he arrived on campus. Capriotti had Storm work out with the K-State cross country team during the fall, however, he ran in just one meet with the Wildcat harriers.

Capriotti also said that Storm is learning the values of hard work in practice, and it is paying off. "He's learning about training. Now he knows about training during the season as well as training off season," Capriotti said. "He knows the way I coach him is starting to pay off."

Capriotti and Storm echo each others thoughts that he can get much better.

"He is so much better than he knows he is, that it isn't even funny," Capriotti said.

"I think I can get a lot better. I did not train this hard at all in high school," Storm said.

Storm, who started the season running the 800 meters, will eventually move from the 1,000 meters to the mile, according to Capriotti.

"He had been running the half, but eventually his race will be the mile," Capriotti said. "He will also be a very good 1,500-meter runner."

Storm will be back in action this weekend as K-State returns to Ahearn Field House after two meets on the road. K-State will play host to the KSU Open this Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

Freshman Jared Storm became the first track team member to break a K-State record this year, setting a mark in the 1,000 meters.

New Mexico State cracks Top 25 poll

By The Associated Press

For the first time in 20 years, New Mexico State has cracked the weekly Associated Press college basketball poll.

"It's great, it's good news," Aggies coach Neil McCarthy said. The Aggies (20-2 overall, 10-1 in the Big West) used conference victories over Cal-Irvine and Cal-Santa Barbara last week to reach the 20-win plateau for the second straight year and vault into the No. 25 spot.

New Mexico State, which beat Nevada-Las Vegas at home earlier in the season and faces the Runnin' Rebels again Thursday night, had barely missed the rankings in recent weeks.

"There are a lot of good teams in the country jockeying to get in the poll," McCarthy said. "We're just pleased to be in there."

The Aggies replaced Indiana (15-6), which fell from the rankings after splitting two Big Ten games last week — a 79-71 loss at Michigan and a 98-75 home victory over Northwestern.

Meanwhile, Kansas and Missouri switched places as the 1-2 teams.

The two meet Tuesday night at Lawrence, with first place in the Big Eight at stake as well as the top spot nationally. Missouri won the first meeting this season, Kansas' only loss and one which ended the Jayhawks' two-week stay as No. 1.

The 1-2 matchup is the first since top-ranked North Carolina won at No. 2 Georgia Tech 78-77 on Feb. 4, 1986.

Kansas (24-1) received 58 first-place votes and 1,570 points from a nationwide panel of sportswriters and broadcasters, while Missouri was named No. 1 on four ballots and had 1,442 points.

Missouri had been No. 1 for three weeks until losing at K-State 65-58 Thursday. The Tigers rebounded with a 107-85 win over Nebraska on Saturday.

Georgetown and Syracuse each moved up two spots from last week, the Hoyas to No. 3 and the Orangemen to No. 4. The Hoyas (19-2) had 1,423 points, while Syracuse (18-3) received the only other first-place vote and 1,379 points.

Michigan (18-4) also moved up two spots to No. 5 with 1,249 points, while Duke (19-4) dropped from fourth to sixth with 1,170 points after losing to Virginia and beating Maryland in overtime.

UNLV (19-4) was seventh, while Arkansas, which dropped to 20-3 after its first Southwest Conference loss — 82-77 to Baylor — fell five places to No. 8.

The Razorbacks had 1,147 points, 50 more than Louisiana State (19-4), which moved from 11th to ninth. Connecticut, which saw a 10-game winning streak snapped by Syracuse, closed out the Top Ten with 940 points.

Oklahoma (17-3) led the Second Ten, followed by Purdue, Georgia Tech, La Salle, Illinois, Oregon State, Minnesota, Louisville, Loyola Marymount and Arizona. Also, Michigan State was 21st, followed by Xavier, Ohio, UCLA, St. John's and New Mexico State.

'Big River' defies Twain disclaimer

Laura Scroggins

REVIEW

In the style of Mark Twain, the opening scene of Big River contained a sign visible to the audience.

It read, "NOTICE: Persons attempting to find a motive in this narrative will be prosecuted; persons attempting to find a moral in it will be banished; persons attempting to find a plot in it will be shot. By order of the author, Mark Twain."

But this was misleading at best, because the narrative did have a motive. It did have a moral, and it definitely had a plot.

The story line was excellent. It was adapted from Twain's novel, "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn." With that as its humble beginnings, it had nothing to fear from failure.

The production opened at the Eugene O'Neill Theatre in New York April 25, 1985. Since then, it boasts seven Tony awards and three other nominations.

It's no wonder. The performances were outstanding.

Pap Finn, Huck's father, and Jim, the runaway slave, were two favorites.

Each blended incredible vocal technique with a believable character performance; Pap with his rhythm and blues solo in, "Guv'ment," and Jim in his two equally moving duets with Huck, "Muddy Water" and "Worlds Apart."

These were not the only aspects of the show worth praise, however.

Considering the limitations of a traveling show, the scenery was fabulous. A motorized raft was used to give the effect of river travel. When it wasn't being used, it fit snugly under a bridge of logs and boards designed to simulate a multitude of settings such as waterfronts and river banks.

A small but adequate orchestra ensemble supplemented the soundtrack played over two stage speakers. Although this was noticeable, it in no way hindered the performances.

Costuming was also exceptional. Designer Patricia McGourty brought a very realistic touch to the everyday wear as well as fabulous creativity to the garb of The Royal Nonesuch, a con artists' dream come true.

The Nonesuch scene was the only major instance of variance from the storyline. The character, designed to be a freak of nature, had claw-like fingers, animal fur, a tail and one "big breast in the middle of his chest" according to the song.

While the scenery, staging, costuming, and supporting performances were all instrumental in transporting the audience into the period of Mississippi river life, the lead performance by Ty Hreben left too much to the imagination.

More than once, the body language, voice intonation and weak accent made one wonder if Hreben was Huck Finn, or Jesus, his previous role in "Godspell." He was too theatrically formal and stiff, and really should have taken a tip from co-star Fred Anzevino, whose performance as Pap Finn was outstanding.

Layne studies bodies in space

By Todd Fertig
Collegian Reporter

Space colonization. Voyages to Mars. Opportunities for long-term living in space are appearing on the not-so-distant horizon as technology races toward the 21st century.

How the body will function in an atmosphere different from Earth's is a mystery that must be solved if man is to live in space for extended periods of time.

Charles Layne, assistant professor of physical education and leisure studies, is breaking new ground in the area of "postural activity," the central nervous system's process of regulating the center of gravity.

Layne specializes in motor control, the study of how the brain and body interact to produce movement. Knowledge of postural activity could prove to be crucial to future endeavors in space, he said.

Layne said he and other scientists have discovered that in a normal environment, when a movement of the arms occurs, muscles in the back and legs are activated to shift the center of gravity. This weight shift is not reactive to the movement, but actually occurs prior to the movement.

The ability to distribute and adjust the body's center of gravity in advance, called "anticipatory postural activity," fascinates scientists like Layne.

Layne said he determined through experimentation the signal sent by the central nervous system to order the weight shift could be a part of the command for the arm movement. It could also be an independent signal working in cooperation with the separate command for the arm movement.

If the signal to the back and legs was part of the command for the arm movement, it could not be separated from the movement under any conditions, he said. If the signal to the back and legs was independent, however, it could potentially be separated through experimentation.

Because the role of postural activity is to regulate the body's center of gravity, Layne said the signal to the back and legs could not be separated in a normal environment.

Layne said he had to conduct the same experiments measuring postural activity again, this time in a weightless environment, which scientists call microgravity.

Access to such an environment is extremely limited, however, he said.

His opportunity came in May 1989 in a project organized by BioServe Space Technologies. BioServe was planning to conduct experiments in microgravity created by flying steep parabolic flight patterns in a NASA jet, the KC-135. This flight pattern would simulate weightlessness for periods of about 30 seconds, when the plane reached the peak of its ascension and went into a sharp dive.

"It's actually created because you are falling at the same rate the earth is falling away from you," Layne said. "It's like when you go over a big bump in your car."

"I'd been trying to ask these questions in different ways on earth," he said. "Then BioServe offered the ultimate environment for asking this question."

In late May, the KC-135 flew from Houston to New Orleans, performing its parabolic pattern during the two-hour flight. Layne and other scientists conducted various experiments. Some of the subjects from BioServe performed the free-floating, arm-raising movements Layne needed while neural activation levels were taken of muscles in their arms, backs and legs.

"The plane laboratory is not a very controlled environment. There are people floating all over," Layne said. The lack of control makes getting good electrical readings from the muscles difficult, he said.

Layne found evidence that the message for postural muscular activation is independent of the arm activity. Electrical readings showed the back muscles were activated much the same as they are on Earth, but the leg muscles were almost entirely inactive.

Layne said he had not anticipated the back and legs to work separately. He thinks the back's role in the movement may be to provide a rigid base, not to maintain the center of gravity.

"We speculate that even though there is no gravity, you need a stable base for the arm movement, but that necessity doesn't extend clear down to the legs," Layne said.

Poindexter trial delayed

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A federal judge Monday delayed the start of John Poindexter's Iran-Contra trial by two weeks, but said former President Reagan's videotaped testimony would be taken Friday as scheduled.

U.S. District Court Judge Harold Greene said disagreement over the use of about 150 classified documents and other matters would require delaying Poindexter's trial from Feb. 20 to March 5.

Richard Beckler, a lawyer for the former national security adviser, urged that Reagan not be questioned until Iran-Contra prosecutors completed presenting their case.

Greene accepted Reagan's proposal to have the deposition on Friday in Los Angeles.

Faculty members propose institute

By Elvyn Jones
Collegian Reporter

A faculty committee is working on a proposal to start a research institute at the University.

The provost requested the proposed Institute for Social and Behavioral Research be formed as part of strategic planning to improve the University during the fiscal years 1992 through 1997, said Leonard Bloomquist, assistant professor in social anthropology and social work and member of the committee.

In addition to conducting its own research, the institute would consult in the design, analysis and computing support for professors and graduate students involved in survey research in the social and behavioral sciences at the University.

As outlined in a pre-proposal prepared by the committee, if fully realized, the institute would involve the expenditure of $3,979,000 over a five-year period in personnel, operating and equipment costs. Of this figure, $2,664,000 would be spent by the University, and the remaining $1,315,000 would come from federal and state grants, donations and revenues from operations.

James Franke, associate professor of political science and chairman of the committee, said the institute, together with the expertise of cooperating faculty, would attract revenues from private industry, foundations and government sources to conduct large scale research projects.

The institute also would be a valuable resource to the state, Franke said.

The institute and cooperating faculty would assist state and local governments and agencies with research, training and consulting in such areas as economic, environmental and demographic studies. It would also enhance the University's appeal with faculty and graduate students, Franke said.

"It would help to attract and retain faculty by giving them the basic support services for their research," Franke said. "It would also be an excellent environment to train graduate students."

Basic support services for faculty research in the social and behavioral fields are not provided for at the University, Franke said.

Sallie McNulty, associate professor of statistics and committee member, said the statistics department has an informal policy of helping faculty in the social and behavioral sciences with survey research questions, but professors are reluctant to ask for help on that basis.

McNulty said professors in these disciplines would know part of the institute's function would be to answer questions about their research. The institute would also provide faculty educational opportunities in existing and emerging methodologies in social and behavioral research, she said.

The committee's final proposal is due June 1, 1990, Franke said.

New car loans not impossible

Students must meet requirements says area bank officer

By Stacie Sanders
Collegian Reporter

Obtaining a new-car loan can be difficult for students, but if they meet certain requirements, it's not impossible, said Tom Holder, vice president of the loan department at Union National Bank and Trust Company.

"If the graduate has (proof) of job acceptance, it helps," Holder said.

Spencer Puls, vice president of Capitol Federal Savings and Loan Association in Manhattan, said loans at his institution depend on where the buyer will be located during his loan repayment period. If the graduate would be working in a city that did not have a Capitol Federal branch, then the loan probably would not be granted, he said.

He said it is difficult for students in college to get new-car loans unless the student is employed full time. They must also be able to demonstrate the ability to make payments, through a budget analysis and credit check.

To obtain a new-car loan, one must go through several steps. Puls said at Capitol Federal one must first complete a loan application. Six months of payment stubs must be furnished in order to establish net and gross pay along with credit references.

He said a written report from the Manhattan Credit Bureau is requested. Capitol Federal verifies references, employment and the credit report. Finally, a budget analysis is conducted to see if one can afford the payments, Puls said.

Union National Bank and Trust Company's process is similar. Holder said the car buyer should first have a particular car in mind. Next, a loan application is made and then cleared.

If no problems arise and the loan is approved, terms for the loan are set, he said.

Current rates of interest on car loans vary. At Union National, 12 percent interest is charged on a typical 60-month loan. Most 60-month car loans require a down payment of 20 percent of the cost of the car. The 48-month loan also requires a 20 percent down payment, however, interest rates are a half percent lower.

Puls said at Capitol Federal, three-year loans typically carry an 11 percent interest rate with a 20 percent down payment. Four-year loans typically carry an 11 percent interest charge, however, a 30 percent down payment is required.

"A three-year loan is preferred because the down payment requirement is lower," he said.

Car dealerships and car companies offer special discounts or deals for first-time buyers. A graduate plan is offered through the General Motors Acceptance Corporation, said Art McKenna, Jr., sales manager for new and used cars at Jim Clark Auto Center in Junction City.

The graduate plan allows a buyer to receive a bonus from $400 to $600 from GMAC. In addition, one can qualify for the first-time buyer program which would provide an additional $600.

McKenna said it is important to remember General Motors Corp. is strictly a dealer-finance organization. GM does not loan money for the purchase of a car, but rather loans against the vehicle, he said.

Jim Clark Auto Center offers graduating seniors and entry-level college students special rebates up to $500 on used cars, McKenna said.

Ford Motor Co. recently announced a program which guarantees credit approval for graduating seniors, said Jim Gaidos, general sales manager for Dick Edwards Ford-Lincoln-Mercury Inc. of Manhattan. The program allows for a deferred payment period of 120 days after delivery, he said. Buyers may be eligible for cash allowances and factory rebates.

"I think it is important that graduates do shop around and also be sure the product will suit their needs for years," McKenna said.

'Serenade VII' raises funds for choir

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State Choir presented Serenade VII, a dinner followed with entertainment, Saturday night and Sunday afternoon in the K-State Union Ballroom.

Serenade is an annual fund raiser to cover the expenses the choir will face through out the year said Rod Walker, professor in music and conductor of the choir.

"We started seven years ago to raise a few pennies. We don't make much but it has helped us a lot," Walker said.

The fund raiser will cover expenses including trips, office help, and sheet music.

"We have some money but it costs to serve a bunch like this. We are constantly looking for ways to enhance the budget," Walker said.

Serenade VII also gave students in the choir a chance to sing some lighter kinds of music, Walker said.

Some of the songs the choir sang were tunes from "The King and I" and "Show Boat."

"It's a nice chance to get to do a program together and get a little publicity for the choir. I don't mind helping out, it's fun," said Andy Stuckey, sophomore in music.

Later this year the choir will be singing at the Kansas Music Education Association conference in Wichita. The fund raiser will help pay for the buses and meals on their trip to Wichita, Stuckey said.

"This is one time of the year that we do something for ourselves," he said.

Serenade VII was sold out Saturday night. It's a popular concert, Walker said.

Tickets for Serenade VII were sold by members of the choir.

Band picks new drum major

Freshman Leuthold chosen in 10-member, 2-week tryout

By The Collegian Staff

Practicing marching maneuvers and conducting music were the main things on 10 students' minds this past week.

These students were members of the K-State Marching Band, and they were competing for the one open position of drum major.

Paul Siegfried, drum major and senior in finance, said it is the responsibility of four drum majors to help teach marching drills and lead the band during pre-game and halftime performance shows.

"We want drum majors to be creative, flexible and have the ability to teach the rest of the band the performance maneuvers and commands when we march," he said.

On Jan. 30, six men and two women attended the first help session for the drum major competition. Siegfried and Chris Erker, graduating drum major and senior in music education, conducted the help session.

The competitors, who have all been in band for at least one year, were nervous and fidgeting as they stood in line to begin practicing. They took turns shouting commands such as right face, forward march and mark time.

As each individual performed the commands in front of the group, the others eyed the competition, and listened attentively as Siegfried or Erker offered advice.

Erker said when drum majors instruct such a large group, provisions must be made in some commands to make them clear.

"When you shout face, as in right face, you have to shout right ace," Erker said. "If you say face, it's too unclear, and the rest of the band in the back isn't going to be able to understand what you've said."

Julie Ball, junior in animal sciences and industry, has wanted to be a drum major since high school.

"My flute teacher was a drum major, and I tried out three times in high school," Ball said. "Being a drum major gives a lot of impressions and ideas about the band. Trying out for drum major conveys that we're interested in the band."

Jason Baker, freshman in biochemistry, said he auditioned to be a drum major because he believes he has the capability to make authoritative decisions. Baker also said he is confident of his music knowledge and leadership qualities.

"I don't feel that being a freshman is a problem, because the position is based on skill," Baker said.

The eight competitors attended a second help session Feb. 1, when two more students joined the competition. They directed the pep band as it played The Star Spangled Banner, and then received criticism from the current drum majors on how to improve in conducting.

Ball said a person's height and vocals have a lot to do with being a drum major.

"Sometimes being a woman is a disadvantage, because vocal commands have to be loud," Ball said. "Someone with a high voice is going to have a harder time than someone with a low-pitch voice. You have to be tall enough, also, because you have to be able to see the other end of the band over the rest of them."

After the help sessions, the competitors were on their own to practice until Wednesday, which was the first night of judged competition.

Baker said he practiced aloud anywhere from four to six hours a day in his dorm room, in his head during class and aloud walking to and from classes.

"I practice during any spare time I have," Baker said.

Ball said she went to the football stadium a couple of times to practice shouting commands loud enough. She also practiced conducting while going to classes and often rehearsed in her mind during class.

Finally, on Wednesday, the competitors were judged by the current drum majors, band director Stan Finck and assistant band director Ben Rohrer. The competitors were responsible for demonstrating and commanding marching maneuvers.

"We had to explain three commands and demonstrate and prove our ability to march," said Doug Twaddell, junior in music.

"Then we had an interview, which consisted of six questions concerning why we wanted to be a drum major, what we could contribute and how we would handle certain situations," he said.

Twaddell considered the interview the most difficult part of the tryout because he had to answer the questions appropriately. The conducting competition, which was the following afternoon, was "pretty basic and easy," Twaddell said.

Siegfried also said the first night of competition was the most stressful.

"I can talk to someone one-on-one, but the interview part with the judges is intimidating," Ball said. "It's scary because you want it so bad. I know I can talk and communicate to others, but you have to let the judges know that."

The second part of the competition was conducting the pep band as it played two songs, after which the judges made their final decision.

Thursday night after the basketball game, Lisa Leuthold, freshman in music education, was selected to fill the remaining drum major position. She will work with drum majors Siegfried; Chad Niehoff, junior in elementary education; and Kathy Wogan, junior in music education.

"I feel (Leuthold) was really capable and will be able to work with returning drum majors very easily. I know it's been her goal since she was in high school band at Manhattan High," Niehoff said.

Leuthold was unavailable for comment.

"All four of us went to Lisa and told her in person that she was selected," Siegfried said. "We gave her a letter and congratulated her. All of the competitors receive a thank you letter."

'Suzuki' method helps musicians develop talents

By Anne Krauss
Collegian Reporter

The word "Suzuki" usually makes people think of motorcycles — unless they are music students. Then the Suzuki method of music instruction is what comes to mind.

The Suzuki method is a non-traditional method that teaches young children to play by ear. Students do not learn to read written music notes until they have mastered the correct posture, have learned to handle the instrument correctly and have developed an ear for music.

"When a child learns a language, they learn to speak first," said Vicki Train, a junior in social work and women's studies and a violin instructor who uses the Suzuki method. "After they can speak it they learn to read. It's the same thing."

The method was developed in Japan by Dr. Shinichi Suzuki immediately following World War II. By the mid-1950s it had found its way to the United States and has been gaining popularity ever since.

The most common instruments that are taught using the Suzuki method are the violin, viola, bass and cello. Train said the same method could probably be expanded to other instruments as well, but these strings were easier to adapt to a small child.

Most children begin learning with the Suzuki method when they are between 3 and 5 years old, but older students can learn as well.

"There's a saying that goes 'You're rarely too young and never too old to twinkle,'" said Jean Krause, a graduate student in music who also teaches the violin with the Suzuki method. "But starting young makes it a natural process for them."

Students meet with the instructor once a week for a private lesson and then attend a group class three times a month. There are four Suzuki teachers in Manhattan, three for violin and one for cello, and all of their students meet together for the group class.

One of the most obvious differences between the Suzuki method and traditional ways of teaching music is the degree of parental involvement. Parents attend lessons with their child and continue the lesson at home.

Students of Manhattan Suzuki instructors will be playing in the K-State Union Courtyard on Feb. 14 at noon.

Sue Peterson, administrative assistant to President Jon Wefald for legislative affairs, said the subcommittee made a late addition to the proposal, making the general fee fund adjustment a permanent policy.

"It's really good that these particular players were involved in the subcommittee," Peterson said. "This is one more hurdle down, but there is a lot of work yet to be done. I'm guardedly optimistic."

She said the subcommittee's proposal means the careful planning done by the University doesn't have to be interrupted, which will ultimately be most beneficial to the students.

Mike Steinle, state and community affairs director and graduate student in business administration, said capital must continue to be spent in order to maintain the quality of education.

"If we're going to keep our standards, these and other proposals not yet thought of must go through the Legislature," Steinle said. "Our goal is to remain status quo and give the state a year to step back and evaluate our situation."

Now the subcommittee's recommendations will go before the Senate for approval, Lubbers said. Then the House will form a subcommittee to make a recommendation to go before the House.

Both Lubbers and Steinle are optimistic about the recommendations passing on a Senate bill, but said much work will be involved in pushing it through the House.

"Five of the most powerful senators were on the subcommittee suggesting this," Lubbers said. "It won't be easy, but those senators endorsing the proposal should prove to be helpful in the Senate."

Steinle said the subcommittee report will weigh heavily in the senators' minds, but the House Ways and Means committee is likely to come up with a whole different list.

"A realistic scenario will have the Senate passing the recommendations, and the House passing something closer to the governor's views," Lubbers said.

Lubbers said the House is typically tight-fisted on education and hasn't been as willing to give up the dollars as the Senate has in the past.

The basic decisions by the committee included agreeing with Hayden's recommendations to provide 4 percent increases for faculty members at a cost of $12 million, a 2.5 percent merit and 1.5 percent cost-of-living increase for non-faculty staff at a cost of $6.75 million and 2 percent increases in other operating expenses at a cost of $2 million.

The Associated Press contributed to this story.

awareness week, which will also come from this account.

Several senators expressed concern about Johnson and the ASK director spending this money without the approval of Senate.

"The intent of the bill was for the money to go to ASK," said Chris Kern, Student Senate chairman. "It wasn't supposed to go for an expense account for the student body president."

During Senate Executive Committee meeting Monday night, several proposals were discussed to put tighter controls on the account. Johnson agreed Senate should have a say in how the money is spent and said a bill that would transfer the money to a KSU Foundation interest-bearing account will be introduced next week. This would effectively put the money back under Senate control.

Discussion of this topic also included pending legislation allocating $1,507 from this account for the annual spring break lobbying trip to Washington, D.C.

"This is an ASK-related activity," Johnson said. "I think you can justify spending this money on ASK-related activities."

The bill will be up for first readings during the regular Senate meeting Thursday night.

Mandela

The state of emergency is seen by the South African government as a way to keep control over spontaneous demonstrations and violent outbursts in the country, yet from the perspective of the blacks, it is an instrument of oppression, Fullagar said. The government will probably agree to some kind of compromise and lift part of the state of emergency while continuing to keep some of it in force to maintain the security, he said.

Fullagar said it would be in Mandela's interest to postpone the talks as long as possible.

"Mandela has several advantages on his side," he said. "First, he has the support of the majority of blacks in South Africa. Second, he is seen as a legitimate leader by the current government, and third, he is head of the ANC, the largest black political organization in South Africa."

"But there are other black parties with conflicting demands, such as the INKATHA, which has always been in political opposition to the ANC. Mandela has to accommodate these other groups, so that he will be speaking for all black people. So the longer it takes for negotiations to occur, the more time Mandela has to accommodate these groups," he said.

On the other hand, if negotiations take place soon, the government will play out those conflicts and attempt to form a coalition with the groups opposing the ANC, Fullagar said.

"This is an enormous task facing Mandela, but I see him as the most likely person to achieve that task," he said.

The South African government not only hurt its own people, Martin said, but also neighboring African countries such as Botswana, Zimbabwe and others.

"Those of us who come from the region believe that apartheid has to be ended in South Africa, and its political system reformed. South Africa has been launching attacks on neighboring countries and using economic sanctions to pressure their governments," Martin said.

According to Fullagar and Martin, American and international sanctions need to be maintained to move the South African government toward negotiations.

Despite what is sometimes said, sanctions are working in pressuring the South African government," Martin said. "The leadership of the blacks is calling for sanctions, so it cannot be true that the sanctions are hurting them more than the government."

"The people are willing to suffer for a short term rather than suffer indefinitely under apartheid, and the international community should listen to what they are asking for," he said.

that he is having an off year from the field is being just a bit harsh, seeing how his field goal percentage is down just 1.2 percentage points from last season.

Henson is just 20 assists shy of last year's 141; he is averaging the same amount of rebounds, and accomplishing all of this while playing in about three-less minutes per ball game.

Until Jean Derouillere came along this season, the team rolled when Henson rolled. But it's kind of hard to do much in the way of offense when you have two, and sometimes three, defenders in your face at once.

There hasn't been much inside punch for K-State this season, which has made Henson's performance stick out when looking at boxscores alone. But it was never more evident than Thursday night against Mizzou who the heart and soul of this Wildcat team is.

The Wildcats' floor leader was a picture of emotion during his second-half performance, scrambling for loose balls, canning the big three-pointer and hitting the free throws down the stretch — vintage Steve Henson.

It's been a tough season for all of the Wildcats, not just Henson. And, in a season like this one, it has been pretty tough for the K-State players to keep their heads up at times.

But not Steve Henson team had ever lost four-straight games, and, as Mizzou can attest, it wasn't going to happen last Thursday.

Maybe Stevie thought he had something to prove Thursday in that phenomenal second-half explosion, but of course that's just Steve Henson — never satisfied.

But Henson has nothing to prove to anybody. Most players' consistency would pale to the everyday performances of Henson, and it's hard to believe that he's fighting for respect from the public this season.

The bottom line is that Steve Henson would do anything for this K-State ball team, and, at times, he has stopped virtually just short of doing that.

So the next time Steve Henson goes flying out of bounds for that loose ball and comes back in with bloodied knees, remember, he didn't have to. And I doubt Cindy Henson likes scabbed-up knees.

CONFERENCE

principal-counselor-student

The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of these high schools to attend the 1990 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with you about your preparation for and experiences in KSU academic programs. Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school faculty. You are welcome to drop by between 10:15 a.m. and 12:15 on Wednesday Feb. 21. This is an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

West, East agree to unite Germany in 2-stage plan

By The Associated Press

OTTAWA, Ontario — The United States and its European allies forged agreement with the Soviet Union and East Germany Tuesday on a two-stage formula to reunite Germany 45 years after the World War II victors divided it.

The nations' foreign ministers released a terse statement on the agreement, and U.S. officials added detail.

In the first stage, East Germany and West Germany would meet on legal, economic and political issues, according to the statement. The talks would begin soon after East Germany holds its March 18 national elections.

In the second stage the foreign ministers of the two Germanys would meet with the foreign ministers of the United States, France, Britain and the Soviet Union "to discuss external aspects of the establishment of German unity, including the issues of security of the neighboring states."

The statement, hammered out at an East-West "open skies" conference, added that "preliminary discussions at the official level will begin shortly."

Although the statement was not specific, among the "external aspects" to be considered by the Big Four allies of World War II — who defeated Nazi Germany and its allies in the most devastating war in history — will be whether the new Germany is a member of the main Western military alliance, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

President Bush telephoned Chancellor Helmut Kohl of West Germany during the day to discuss final details of the agreement, according to a White House statement Tuesday night.

The news came late in the evening in Germany, too late for most citizens to react immediately. The West German television network broadcast a live report from its correspondent in Ottawa shortly after 11 p.m. German time.

ARD pointed out that the way seemed clear for most of the points, but that the foreign ministers had "set to one side" temporarily the tricky question of the military posture of a united Germany.

In East Berlin, the official news agency ADN distributed the news at 10:43 p.m. in a brief report that noted, "The discussions will also include the questions of security of neighboring states."

The agreement on German unification was one of three at the NATO-Warsaw pact conference capping an extraordinary eight days of diplomacy that saw U.S. Secretary of State James A. Baker III confer with allies and others in Ireland, Czechoslovakia, the Soviet Union, Romania, Bulgaria and finally in Ottawa.

German unity excites students, professor

By Julie Andsager
Features Editor

Plans to reunify East and West Germany have caught the attention of K-State students and faculty with interests in the two countries.

Adrian Fiech, graduate student in computer science from West Germany, said reunification would be beneficial for Germans. "It will be great to be one nation," Fiech said. "We speak the same language and have the same culture. Germany will become the most economically powerful nation in Western Europe."

Reunification would allow Germany to invest more money in industry, Fiech said.

Economic reunification is already well advanced, said Joseph Hajda, professor of political science.

"The possibility, I think, is quite clear that economic coordination will proceed in a pretty rapid fashion," Hajda said.

The United States, its allies and the Soviet Union will influence the Germanys' decision, Hajda said. The Soviet Union has more than half a million troops in East Germany, while the United States has more than 300,000 in West Germany. He said France, Great Britain and Canada also have troops in West Germany.

"The West German government has already announced there are legitimate interests of other nations involved in the situation," Hajda said. "(West Germany is) not going to make a move that will provoke an explosion and all sorts of problems."

Fiech said Germans expect to have some internal difficulties at first, but reunification advantages would outweigh the disadvantages.

"The most important thing is that Germany is back together," Fiech said.

Hajda said many problems are being taken care of by the Germans themselves.

"The people are resolving it pretty quickly," Hajda said. "The free elections in the middle of March will, I think, give us a much better reading on how difficulties will be resolved."

"East Germany is now proving to be closer to the West German complexion," he said.

Fiech said he has family in East Germany. They are allowed to visit West Germany every two or three years for special occasions.

"Imagine if someone draws a line between Kansas and Missouri," Fiech said. "You cannot see your family. You cannot cross the line except maybe every second year."

When Fiech visited West Germany last summer, he said the main topic of conversation was the political activity in Eastern Europe. At that time, though, the East German government was still strict, he said.

Fiech went home during semester break and found the situation had changed.

"Everybody in Germany was talking about reunification," Fiech said.

First Lady Barbara Bush responds to a reporter's question Tuesday afternoon in Salina following an address to the Salina Area Chamber of Commerce. In her speech, Bush urged people to volunteer in any way possible.

Barbara Bush visits Salina Volunteerism, literacy focus of first lady's speech

By Julie Andsager
Features Editor

President George Bush would not go to Colombia Thursday if his life was in danger, Barbara Bush said Tuesday at a press conference in Salina.

"He's going to have every possible protection he can have," Bush said. "I have great faith in the Secret Service. He wouldn't go if he were risking his life. They wouldn't let him go, believe you me."

Bush was in Salina to speak at the 79th annual banquet of the Salina Area Chamber of Commerce. Following her luncheon address, she spoke briefly to the press in the Bicentennial Center.

The first lady later stopped in Kansas City on her way back to Washington, D.C. Bush said the president's trip to Colombia is necessary to show U.S. support in the fight against drug cartels.

Bush left little doubt she supports George Bush's decisions. A reporter asking if Bush thought her husband had made a mistake did not get a chance to finish the question.

"No," Bush interrupted, raising her voice. "The answer's no."

Although Bush said she does not get involved in political decision-making, she has hopes for the United States in 1990.

"I'd love to see less hunger, more people taken care of, less people on the streets, more people learning to read," Bush said, "because I feel in my heart that if more people learned to read and comprehend, we'd have less unemployment, less teen pregnancies and less drugs."

About 1,600 people gathered to hear Bush speak in the Bicentennial Center.

During her speech, Bush told Salinans she admired their resilience and hard work in improving their city.

"I'm so impressed with how you've turned Salina around in the past two decades from a town with a failing economy to a kind of boomtown," Bush said.

"They say you can judge a man by the company he keeps," she said. "I might suggest you can judge a state and city by the people it produces. If this is true, Kansas and Salina surely are the top state and city in the country."

Bush took advantage of her husband's catch phrase to congratulate Salina and its residents on being named an All America City in 1989.

"You are a thousand points of light all unto yourselves," she said.

Bush told the audience that volunteerism is necessary to solve U.S. social problems, such as illiteracy. Since becoming first lady, Bush has made increasing volunteerism and fighting illiteracy her causes.

"From now on, any definition of a successful life in America must include service to others," Bush said. "Every one of you lives close enough to someone who needs help."

"Compassion, initiative, commitment — that irresistible inclination is as strong and needed as ever," she said. "And don't think you have to take on all the world's problems at once. Remember, they took down the Berlin Wall almost one brick at a time."

Bush has been actively involved in the causes, Gov. Mike Hayden said when he introduced her to the audience.

"Barbara is a person who very much has led the effort on volunteerism and education," Hayden said. "She especially has been concerned about literacy in our country and some of the basic fundamentals of education such as reading."

Bush is honorary chairman of the National Committee on Literacy and Education, the advisory board of Reading is Fundamental, the Barbara Bush Foundation for Literacy and Partnerships in Education.

Agriculture college gets cut

Budget reductions claim 46 percent of school's funds

By Anne Krause
Collegian Reporter

Although all of the colleges are feeling the sting of recent state funding recisions, the College of Agriculture has been cut more deeply than most.

The college will bear 46 percent of the total funding cut, said Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture.

This means $588,264 that was already budgeted for this year must be cut. Of this, 8.6 percent will be cut from teaching, 44 percent from the Agriculture Experiment Stations, 45 percent from the Cooperative Extension Service and 2.5 percent from international agriculture programs.

"In comparative data of the College of Ag and its peer institutions, we are underfunded at the present time," Woods said. "Thus, cutting the budget has the impact of widening the gap."

Woods said the reason the cut is so large is because of the many programs outside of academic instruction that are associated with the College of Agriculture.

The first move towards meeting the cuts will be to reduce the number of classified and unclassified employees hired, Woods said. Many open positions will remain unfilled, but no filled positions will be vacated.

"We have not cut any positions that were filled in the system," he said. "We don't anticipate anyone losing a job because of this."

Stanley Farlin, associate director of cooperative extension, said the reduction in personnel numbers could have a negative effect on those employed by the college.

"It may affect the people still on board. Some people may be asked to pick up on understaffed areas and that puts pressure on those people," Farlin said. "It may cause some of those folks to cast their eyes around a bit."

Woods said everything possible was being done to minimize the long-term impact of the recisions on the goals of the college, but it has become very difficult to plan for the future.

"It creates a real uncertainty associated with planning for this year," said Woods. "Now we have to wait in making any final plans."

Decisions concerning major improvements and purchases must be delayed until the level of state support for next year is determined.

George Ham, associate dean and associate director for the Agriculture Experiment Station, said such delays could set many research programs back several years.

Core curriculum proposal debated

By Melissa Simpson
Staff Reporter

Implementing common University degree requirements was discussed by the Faculty Senate Tuesday.

Jerry Frieman, head of the Common University Degree Requirements Committee, presented a proposal for a core curriculum emphasizing a general education that challenges students to think.

Frieman said common degree requirements have always been the concern of the University, and since fall 1988 the academic affairs committee has expressed concern for a liberal education consisting of communications, problem solving and critical thinking.

Components of the core curriculum for all University graduates include English language courses such as written composition and oral communications. A library usage course, a mathematics quantitative reasoning course and a nature of knowledge course are several requirements implemented in the proposal.

"We feel these requirements are reasonable and prudent," Frieman said. "Discussion needs to take place in the departments."

Senator Jim Steichen, member of the academic affairs committee, said he believes copies of the proposal should be distributed to the deans and every faculty member so it can be discussed within the colleges before action proceeds.

Course and curriculum changes in the architecture and design and human ecology colleges, which were previously approved by their respective colleges, were approved by the Faculty Senate.

Steichen then proposed a change in the admissions policy for transfer students. The change would require a 2.0 grade point average and eligibility to be admitted at the transfer student's last-attended institution. Presently, the admissions policy for transfer students is only a 2.0 GPA.

The proposal was declined and sent back to academic affairs because problems with financial aid and housing deadlines. Also, the students' grades from the last semester would be unknown when they applied for admission.

Senator Anthony Jurich expressed his concern about the graduation ceremonies for graduate students. He said graduate students should have a

KGB accounts for victims

MOSCOW — More than 750,000 people were shot to death as enemies of the state during Stalin's 1930-53 reign of terror, the KGB secret police said in a report Tuesday.

The figure does not include the millions who died in labor camps and prisons or in the famines during Stalin's collectivization of agriculture, but it represented the first time the KGB has given a figure for any of Stalin's victims.

Many Western sources say that altogether more than 10 million people were killed.

Under President Mikhail S. Gorbachev's reforms, government commissions and the KGB have been ordered to find the truth about Stalin's terror and rehabilitate the victims.

Gorbachev's KGB director, Vladimir A. Kryuchkov, has pledged to never again permit the secret police to be involved in such repression.

The official Tass news agency quoted a KGB committee as saying a review of its archives determined that 3,778,234 people had been sentenced for counterrevolutionary activities or crimes against the state from 1930 to 1953, when Stalin died.

It said 786,098 of them, including many top state and party leaders, scientists, military leaders and cultural figures, had been shot to death.

Survey: drug use declined

WASHINGTON — Use of illegal drugs by high school seniors, college students and other young adults declined in 1989, continuing a decade-long trend, according to an annual survey released Tuesday.

The survey, funded by the National Institute on Drug Abuse, said illegal drug use dropped last year among all three categories of young people surveyed, and that casual use among high school seniors and college students is about half what it was a decade ago.

"This reduced demand is attributable largely to the important changes occurring in the attitudes, beliefs and social norms among our young people," said Lloyd Johnston, a University of Michigan social scientist who helped conduct the survey, which was funded by the National Institute on Drug Abuse.

He said the decline has come about because anti-drug messages have made illegal drug use "unfashionable." And he noted the dropoff has been occurring despite students' belief that marijuana and cocaine are easy to get.

Survey officials, however, said they continue to be concerned about use of crack, the highly addictive, smokable form of cocaine.

Company files for bankruptcy

NEW YORK (AP) — Drexel Burnham Lambert Inc. said Tuesday its parent company was filing for federal bankruptcy court protection, signaling the demise of the Wall Street firm that came to symbolize quick riches and scandal in the 1980s.

Drexel's board of directors authorized the parent, Drexel Burnham Lambert Group Inc., to seek protection from creditors under Chapter 11 of the federal bankruptcy code.

The step climaxed one of the most tumultuous periods in Wall Street history for the cocksure investment house, which pioneered the use of risky, high-interest "junk bonds" to finance billions of dollars worth of corporate takeovers under now-indicted executive Michael Milken.

Drexel was crippled by the government's insider trading investigation, in which it pleaded guilty to six felonies and paid $650 million to settle fraud charges.

Plane crash kills 2 aboard

BURLINGTON, N.C. (AP) — A business airplane crashed in a wooded field in this city Tuesday evening, killing the two people aboard and narrowly missing an automobile dealership, officials said.

The 20-seat Beech King Air twin-engine turboprop went down about a mile from Interstate 85 around 6:30 p.m., said police Sgt. Vickie Saunders.

The Holt Manufacturing Co. plane was en route from New York to Burlington Municipal Airport when it crashed, officials said. An earlier report had said the craft was a commuter plane.

The plane went down in a field about 150 feet across the street from a house, said an official with Alamance County Emergency Management who refused to give his name. The aircraft did not burn on impact.

"I think it's pretty tore up," the official said.

The pilot and a passenger were killed, Ms. Saunders said.

Holt, a textile manufacturing company based in Burlington, would not confirm whether its plane was involved in the crash, said a company official who refused to give his name.

KCC orders refund of millions

TOPEKA (AP) — The Kansas Corporation Commission Tuesday ordered Kansas Gas and Electric Co. of Wichita to reduce its rates by $8.7 million and refund that amount of money, plus interest, to its customers.

The commission instructed the utility to cut from $14.4 million to $5.7 million the amount of additional revenue it collects for retirement of its Ripley Steam Generating Plant in Wichita.

KG&E has been allowed to collect the $14.4 million to cover the inclusion in its rate base of 46 megawatts of power from the Wolf Creek nuclear plant near Burlington to replace the lost generating capacity of the Ripley plant.

The commission told KG&E to refund the extra $8.7 million it began collecting on Jan. 1, 1989, and to reduce its rates to make the $8.7 million reduction permanent.

A KCC statement said that, assuming the over-collection ends by March 31, the refund, including interest, would total about $11.4 million.

The $8.7 million rate reduction translates to about $1.50 a month for the customer who uses 750 kilowatt hours of electricity monthly, the KCC said.

Jury continues deliberations

TOPEKA (AP) — The jury in the fraud trial of Wichita oilman James W. Hershberger deliberated its first full day Tuesday, concluding at 5 p.m. without a verdict.

It will resume deliberations today.

The eight-woman, four-man jury began deliberating at 3:45 p.m. Monday. Members will deliberate until 5 p.m. each day, until they reach a verdict.

The jury must determine if Hershberger is guilty of 37 counts of bank, mail and investor fraud.

Throughout the day, jury members sent questions to the judge and asked that some testimony be read to them. No specifics were provided by court personnel in Judge Dale E. Safels' office.

The jury also asked for all the exhibits that had been presented in the case and for a list of all the witnesses who had testified. Those items were denied them as they were unavailable, court personnel said.

The Hershberger trial began Jan. 8 and testimony continued for five weeks in federal court.

Steam lines damaged

Required repairs to begin in May

By Tomari Quinn
Staff Reporter

Repairs to 2,200 feet of damaged steamlines that run beneath the campus will begin this summer.

Lee McQueen, assistant director of facilities engineering, said three miles of tunnels house 11 miles of pipe that carry steam to heat 85 percent of the University's facilities.

Sections of the tunnels date back to the 1800s, McQueen said. Other sections were added in the 1970s, including the damaged sections, which were built in 1973.

The damaged sections extend from 17th and Claflin streets to Call Hall and are in need of significant work, he said.

Construction repairs will take about three months, and are scheduled to begin in May. Facilities engineers are meeting with an engineering firm to make preliminary plans, McQueen said.

Metal expands when heated, and expansion joints take up and control growth from the pipe, he said. The expansion joints are bolted to the wall, and all the bolts are broken in the damaged section of the steamline.

McQueen said a shock may have gone through the system causing one of the bolts to snap, and the other bolts were probably unable to take on the additional weight, causing them to break.

"We feel it's an unsafe pipe right now," he said. "We've been concerned enough to have prepared contingency plans to supply power to the area affected in case the pipe becomes unfunctional."

The damaged system is still working and should not be a problem as long as it is maintained at a steady temperature, McQueen said. The average temperature in the tunnels is easily in excess of 130 degrees, he said.

"We could attempt to mend it in a bubble-gum patch fashion," McQueen said, "but there is still the potential that because of this problem, even after repairs, the pipe might not be as strong as we would like. We might have to repair large sections of the tunnel."

"We've prepared for a worst-case scenario."

McQueen said the pipe inspector isn't allowed to enter the danger area, but sticks his head into the tunnel through a manhole to listen for problems.

During semester break, a small line began to crack in the damaged section, he said. The crack turned out to be minor and was repaired without problems.

"We're listening and watching for other problems," McQueen said.

One of the problems workers face is the significant number of telephone and cable lines that run through the tunnels, he said.

"That's why there aren't any telephone poles on the campus," McQueen said. "Some people didn't understand the intention of the tunnels and were just looping computer cables everywhere."

He said a pin-hole-sized leak in a steamline could blow off the arm of an adult male. This and other reasons mandate that only authorized personnel and supervised observers enter the tunnels.

A number of people still enter the tunnels without authorization, McQueen said.

"It's not a trivial number," he said. "We find physical evidence of the trespassers. People go down to have a beer and leave the cans lying around."

McQueen said stumbling upon the foreign objects creates a hazard for work personnel, as the tunnels can be dark for stretches of the tunnel system.

"The tunnels are for experienced people who know what they're doing down there," he said. "There are sudden drop-offs of several feet in places. One kid took a 20 foot fall and got a broken arm a few years ago."

McQueen said entering the tunnels is considered trespassing.

"We don't shoot the trespassers," he said. "But it is highly discouraged because of the dangers involved."

Charles Beckom, K-State police chief, said the rate of entry to the tunnels has decreased in the past few years because potential trespassers have become aware of prosecution charges if caught and know about the hazards of the steam tunnels.

All unauthorized entries to the tunnels will be charged with criminal trespassing, he said.

"At this point it's not a major problem," Beckom said. "We are concerned with the safety aspect. There is extreme heat in the tunnels, and the electrical and cable lines can be very dangerous."

"The electrical lines have a tendency to become subject to failure over a period of years, and we wouldn't want someone in the wrong place touching something at the wrong time."

Beckom said only a few unauthorized

Committee hears admissions testimony

Board of Regents disagree on issue of setting new requirement standards

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — When it comes to improving education, almost everyone agrees there is a problem, but almost no one can agree on how to solve it.

In that spirit, the state Board of Regents made another stand at the Statehouse Tuesday on the issue of setting admission requirements at regents' institutions.

The House Appropriations Committee heard testimony, but took no action, on a bill that would establish minimum admission criteria for those desiring to enter state universities governed by the regents.

Regents' Executive Director Stan Koplik said he had requested that the committee introduce the bill instead of the House Education Committee because the proposal needed a change of scenery. A "qualified admissions" proposal died in the House last year.

A number of Appropriations Committee members support the idea, he said.

Proponents and opponents traded standard rhetoric on the issue. Proponents said the proposed system would give students a better shot at success, while opponents either disagreed there was a problem or said there was a better way to achieve success.

Probably the most critically received opponent was Bill Curtis, lobbyist for the Kansas Association of School Boards. Curtis told the committee he didn't think there was a problem with the quality of students' education or in the preparation they received in public schools.

"I'm very disappointed in the testimony," responded Rep. Wanda Fuller, R-Wichita.

Fuller said business people are telling legislators that young people are unprepared to enter the business world. She said the Board of Regents wouldn't be asking for tighter admission standards if public schools were doing a better job.

Curtis said his members had voted three times to continue the current system of open admissions, wherein any student who graduates from a Kansas high school automatically qualifies to enter a regents' university.

"I don't understand your members saying it (the educational system) is not broken," said Rep. James Lowther, R-Emporia. "The evidence has been there since 1987. I can't imagine what data you're using to reject this."

And, Rep. Henry Helgeson, D-Wichita, told Curtis, "If you've got a better plan, come up with it."

Also testifying against the bill was David DePue, executive director of the Kansas Council on Vocational Education. DePue told the committee that higher entrance standards to state universities wouldn't reduce the number of dropouts and that the real problems students have are not academic, but social, personal and financial.

He argued for applied skills instead of theoretical training he said was contained in the liberal arts courses the regents recommended.

Barbie represents impossible standards

I want to be a Barbie. You know, the long-legged beauties with the straw-blond locks who smile even when it hurts. Barbie, well, she's like a mentor we all should have. Most of us did, us girls, of course. She was our best friend before we knew she'd become our worst enemy. That sounds contradictory, right? I want to be a Barbie, yet I loathe her. Well, that's the beauty of the relationship — you know, that love-hate stuff. I love her looks. I hate her. I hate my looks. I would love to look like her. I hate the women who look like her. I would love to look like them. Barbie is in a state of perpetual bliss not only because of Ken, but because she gets to choose among many roles which one she wants to play: goddess, lover, singer, superstar, even housewife. But of course, if and when Barbie does cook, she only bakes cakes, cookies and pies. But of course, she never eats a bite of these "bad-for-Barbie" foods. She couldn't dare jeopardize her physique.

I want to be a Barbie. Barbie works on her own body, in her own fitness gym, at her own home, in her own leotards, with her own headband wrapped around her own dainty skull. (I tried to rip Barbie's skull apart once, looking for a brain — I ended up with one ugly Barbie — one empty Barbie. It was fun. Don't tell.) But when Barbie exercises, Barbie "glows" and moisture accumulates upon her shapely brow. I sweat. I must learn to "glow."

I want to be a Barbie. Perhaps full-body plastic surgery would be the panacea to my imperfection. Or I could wrap myself in cellophane and then sit in the sauna for a day or two. Or I could have a special doctor pour those miracle-working chemicals on my skin, melt away all imperfection, and then start out with a clean, wrinkle- and blemish-free complexion. Barbie always said, "Beauty is a painful process."

I have always wanted Barbie to have Barbie babies but that would jeopardize her

Jana Leep

COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

physique. So she and Ken use an efficient means of contraception — abstinence. Sex is too messy for Barbie. She may be infertile anyway. With no padding on her taut little bod, she's probably never experienced the monthly female phenomenon. I have — I must work diligently to achieve a biological age of nine or ten. I must be able to wear a size three or four. So much work to be done. I want to be a Barbie. But if something happens that I can't, I will rear my daughter to be a Barbie-born-again. Yes, she will eat Barbie breakfast cereal every morning. She will have a Barbie lunch pail. She will watch and listen and learn from her mother the art of dieting and perpetual primping. It is an art she will have the opportunity to master, for she will receive positive strokes from all her envious peers. She'll be able to enter beauty pageants and pretend to be a mannequin in store windows. The day that my little Barbie is mistaken for a mannequin will be a proud one. But it would be even better if she were mistaken for Barbie herself.

My baby Barbie will, of course, only play with Barbie. This will be her only toy, for Barbie is more than a toy, she is a way of life. I will equip her with all the Barbie paraphernalia, even Ken. (Some say Barbie is part of Ken's paraphernalia.) But Ken, of course, will be introduced at the appropriate age. Baby Barbie doesn't want to start too early — that may hurt her pure image. Baby Barbie will learn how to interact with boys, especially boys like Ken, with his good looks, great bod, slick hair, money, fast car, all the right moves, muscular build and lack of intelligence. I will allow her to play only with G.I. Joe boys (boys raised under the philosophical guidance of G.I. Joe paraphernalia). She will learn early that she likes rough and tough boys — boys who will become men, who will protect and shelter her. Barbie will be prepared.

I will comb and curl and create her each morning before school. Take it from Barbie herself — being beautiful is a job. My baby Barbie will suffer through painful perms and scorched skin (curling irons are the worst) because she will care what she looks like. Barbie's Vanity Mirror will be the altar in front of which my Barbie-born-again will primp.

But enough of this dreaming, how would I survive a pregnancy without jeopardizing my thighs? I must concentrate on my own goals, first. I have got to be a Barbie. If I don't, I won't even find a Ken.

Selecting new landfill not a win/lose matter

At least one Riley County commissioner seems to believe selecting a site for a new county landfill will come down to two things — winners and losers.

"The losers are going to be everybody who lives within (three miles) of the site, and the winners are going to be everybody else."

This sentiment, expressed by Riley County Commissioner Dick Jepsen during a meeting of county officials and residents a week ago, reflects a poor attitude in dealing with an issue that will affect thousands of area residents.

Finding a site for building a landfill has become increasingly controversial since the state ordered the current landfill closed. Jepsen only exacerbates the situation with his attitude of claiming to know what's best for everyone.

Residents, aware of the ill-fate of the current landfill, should not be discouraged from asking questions and demanding answers.

More public scrutiny would have been useful in preventing the groundwater contamination that ultimately caused the state to order the Riley County Landfill closed by June 1991.

Jepsen also has refused to release information on some proposed sites for the landfill.

"If we went five miles to the south, we'd have the same groups complaining," he said.

His reluctance to release information on the proposed sites to avoid dealing with the public is ludicrous in its logic. Residents who are speaking out on the subject are the same ones who will be most affected by it.

Instead of viewing these concerned residents as an annoyance, Jepsen and other county officials should consider these arguments and respond to them. Residents are only now asking questions that should have been answered before the current landfill was ever built.

World of difference lies between old and new

In 1983, Ronald Reagan described the Soviet Union as the focus of evil in the world.

In 1985, Mikhail Gorbachev became General Secretary of the Soviet Communist Party.

Between those two events lies a world of difference.

For the past 45 years, American ideology has been based on the existence of a diametrically opposed adversary in the world.

Under Gorbachev's leadership, the adversary has come to look less malevolent, less a threat than at any time since the alliance between the two superpowers during World War II.

The recent decision by the Central Committee of the Communist Party to give up its monopoly of power further lessens the differences between the two nations.

Suddenly, the evil empire, with its moribund economy, rusting industrial base and ideologically decrepit leadership, has begun to look more like a mirror image.

Certainly this view may not stand up under close scrutiny. Exactly what the KGB does now that it no longer polices thought has yet to be told and the closure of all the gulags has yet to be announced.

But, as the American people try to keep track of change after change, they should assume that the feeling of disorientation the new world engenders affects their leaders.

For instance, President Bush urges caution as democracy blossoms in Eastern Europe and Defense Secretary Dick Cheney urges restraint in making defense cuts.

As the old spectre of communism haunts the world less and less, the old structure of American policy, and the ideology which underpinned it, is being lost.

Between the proclamation of the Truman Doctrine, which described the policy of containment, in the late 1940s, and the revolutions of 1989, lie two different worlds.

TRY IT COMRADE...IT'S CALLED A "HAPPY MEAL."

LETTERS

Reminiscing

Editor,

It was after the K-State victory over the Missouri Tigers that I decided to write this long overdue letter.

I am currently a graduate student at Indiana University. Prior to my graduate work I completed a fun-filled five year degree at K-State.

During my five years as a K-State student I spent countless hours at fraternity and sorority functions, paying the electric bills for many of the local taverns, an hour in Farrell, and last — but God knows, not least — endless nights at Ahearn Field House and Bramlage Coliseum supporting our Wildcats.

Coming to IU, I have had the opportunity to enjoy a first-hand experience of Big Ten basketball. In a land where basketball often decides major political events, I have been disappointed by the crowd support. These people think that they have a monopoly on spirit and enthusiasm. They obviously have missed the enlightening experience of a frenzied purple and white crowd.

I only hope K-State supporters don't follow the example of my current school and take for granted their team and school. The numbers in the win/loss column should not dictate the degree of support. It was after I graduated and went on to a different school that I realized the pride that I have in my school. I hope other students don't wait until their graduation to show their colors.

Good luck Coach Kruger and the rest of the Wildcats on the rest of your season.

Task force needed

Editor,

I am writing in response to the staff editorial in last Friday's Collegian. The editorial questions the timeliness of setting up a task force to evaluate the Rec Services needs when the "students of our University whine to the state about funding of the library." I ask the members of the Collegian editorial board:

Should engineering students build Durland Phase III? Should business students renovate Calvin Hall? Should all students at K-State pay an extra fee to subsidize faculty salaries? The answer to all three of these questions is no.

Just as the academic needs on our campus should be funded by the state, so should improvements to the library. My position from the beginning remains that students should not pay for a library addition. Progress is being made toward obtaining money from the state. A consultant study to identify library space needs was recently announced by President Wefald. This is the initial step in obtaining state money. We can have a major impact on state priorities, or we can just sit back and increase fees as you suggest.

K-State students should fund those priority projects we can not expect the state to pay for. There is a need to look at the rec service on campus. The rec services task force will examine the various options to accommodate needs of rec patrons. I hope we can accommodate the patrons using the existing facilities. But if the only alternative is to build an addition, we will recommend it. Also, the money to bring any of these changes will become available in 1992. Planning two years in advance does not seem "inappropriate."

Our focus this year in student government will be to bring about positive changes. If you're worried two student government projects are more than we can handle then you greatly underestimate the people involved. Just wait to see what we do next.

Students apathetic

Editor,

Once again K-State students have shown their indifference toward city policy making. More than two-thirds of the student population live off campus, yet only a handful showed up at the Feb. 7 public hearing to hear discussion on the rental inspection program.

Perhaps landlords are correct that students don't care if they live in unsafe housing as long as their rent is low. Surprisingly, landlords admitted a majority of their rentals do not comply with BOCA (Existing Structures Building Codes) standards. These codes are nationally accepted standards and landlords complained the "standards were meant for New York City ... not Manhattan, Kansas." Does this mean Manhattan needs to lower its quality of housing?

Some students fear their rents will go up if the rental inspection program is implemented. Don't you realize they will go up no matter what, due to the increases in student enrollment? Remember the economic principle of supply and demand? If the quantity demanded goes up, so does the price. So why can't students get their money's worth by having housing that meets minimum standards?

The K-State Consumer Relations Board has been fighting for this type of inspection program for years, ever since the University stopped inspecting off-campus student housing in the 1970s. (That's right, the University used to implement standards of its own.)

CRB has received numerous complaints concerning landlords — some of them legitimate, some of them not. A lot of complaints were due to students' ignorance of the state Landlord/Tenant Act, the city's BOCA standards and Escrow Ordinance which affect health and safety of existing housing. And students still don't care to know.

If you do support the Rental Inspection Program the city is trying to develop, let your student representative who sits on the Citizens Advisory Committee know.

anhattan knows basketball. Manhattan knows football. Manhattan knows ice hockey?

Anyone hanging around the Manhattan Parks and Recreation ice rink on Thursday nights or Sunday mornings can see just how well Manhattan knows ice hockey.

Five years ago, the Manhattan Hockey Club was formed. Team players will be the first to admit that at that time they weren't very good.

"When we started out, we really got creamed by a couple of teams," said Les Horn, a Manhattan police officer and co-founder of the team.

Since then, the team has improved and Horn has the trophies to prove it.

"We have some guys from back East who played college hockey, and they are good," Horn said.

About 20 players belong to the hockey club.

The team plays competitively during cold weather, and the members play street hockey for fun during the off-season.

"We actually started out playing street hockey," Horn said. "Then we decided it would be more fun to play on ice."

The team used to compete in matches about every other week but the cost of traveling has forced it to cut down. On March 10, the team plans to travel to St. Joseph, Mo., for a tournament — its second of the year.

The Hockey Club is comprised of college students, military personnel and Manhattan residents.

Because the team has no sponsor, the players are responsible for paying for their own equipment, transportation and ice time.

"We try to get $50 a year from all the players to cover ice time," Horn said. "It costs us every time we practice."

"We've put in an application to become a K-State club," said Jake Kisel, sophomore in education. "We'd like to get a sponsor so we could go to more tournaments."

The players buy most of their gear through mail-order catalogs because hockey equipment is not readily available in the Manhattan area.

"When we make trips to St. Louis, we sometimes pick up stuff we need," Horn said.

The team has a St. Louis connection. Horn first got interested in hockey while his family lived there when he was young. The team has also played pre-games before the St. Louis Blues games.

Horn said the sport is relaxing.

"Playing hockey relieves some of the stress of being a policeman," he said.

For many of the players, hockey is more than just a sport, Horn said. It is a big part of their lives.

"You could say I'm obsessed with hockey," Horn said.

Lady Cats face last-place OU

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

If the Lady Cats thought the pressure was on when they were sitting atop the Big Eight Conference with a 7-0 record, and everybody else shooting for them, they might be thinking that their one-time, two-game lead was nothing compared to now.

As quick as interim Lady Cats' coach Gaye Griffin could say, "two-straight road losses," K-State found itself tied with Missouri for the league lead at 8-2.

In a race that seemed to be the Lady Cats' to win, there will now be a dogfight to the end for that coveted conference crown.

The Lady Cats begin their trek toward the end of the season tonight in Bramlage Coliseum, when the conference cellar dweller, Oklahoma, visits for a 7 p.m. contest.

"We don't really worry about that," Griffin said of the Lady Cats feeling any more pressure as the conference stretch runs nears. "We just need to take care of our job and let everybody else take care of their business, and the chips will fall where they fall."

The Lady Cats have found themselves in their sudden two-way tie for first place by not being able to pick up two key road wins at Missouri and Colorado. K-State dug itself a huge hole early in both contests, and then had big rallies fall short in the end.

The falling behind early has to be a concern for Griffin. K-State has trailed at halftime in each of its last three ball games, including its 60-58 victory in Bramlage Coliseum last week.

"I want us to come out at the start and play hard," Griffin said. "At Colorado, we couldn't hit anything, especially in the first half. Our intensity just wasn't there."

"We can't play that way against Oklahoma and expect to win."

In the two teams' first meeting, forward Diana Miller lit the Lloyd Noble Arena nets on fire with a 35-point performance in Norman. Miller canned four three-pointers in a second half that saw the Lady Cats rally from a 45-37 halftime deficit, to defeat the Lady Sooners, 94-87.

"They gave us a good test down at Oklahoma," Griffin said. "The girls know what Oklahoma can do. Oklahoma is probably the most athletic team in the Big Eight, and they're a very good rebounding team."

Miller has led the Lady Cats in scoring in 12 of their 23 games. She is averaging 17 points a game, while also grabbing 6.3 rebounds. The junior from Buhler has hit 32-of-81 three-point tries for 39.5 percent.

Of K-State's last four regular season games, only one will be on the road, at Oklahoma State, and that fact will help ease Griffin's nerves a bit.

"That makes you feel good," Griffin said. "We'll get the fans' support, and start getting people out (to Bramlage) now that we're coming down the home stretch."

After tonight, the Lady Cats will next be in action at home on Saturday night, when Iowa State ventures into Bramlage for a 7 p.m. contest.

Mizzou downs Kansas

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — If it wasn't for Missouri, top-ranked Kansas would be working on a perfect season.

The No. 2 Tigers beat the Jayhawks for the second time this season — their only losses in 26 games.

The Tigers' 77-71 victory on Tuesday night was also the second time Missouri beat Kansas when it had the No. 1 ranking.

"It wasn't different this time," said Anthony Peeler, who led the Tigers with 22 points. "The big difference for us right now is the Big Eight title and beyond. One-two is up in the air right now. That's for other people to decide."

Missouri (23-2, 9-1) is making it a lot easier.

The Tigers beat Kansas (24-2, 7-2) 95-87 on Jan. 20 with a dominant inside attack. This time, they relied on strong outside shooting and some solid defense.

"They are a great team," Kansas coach Roy Williams said of Missouri, which snapped a 14-game home winning streak for the Jayhawks. "They hit inside, outside. They rebound the heck out of it and they play defense. You better be ready to play them and get lucky and hope they don't shoot the ball well."

Missouri, which held the No. 1 spot for three weeks after beating Kansas last time, shot 55.1 percent for the game (27-for-49), while the Jayhawks managed just 43.9 (29-66).

"We weren't sharp and the ball didn't go in the basket," Williams said.

Tigers coach Norm Stewart had a good reason for that.

"I thought our defense was very good at times as well as our rebounding," he said. "It was a great win and a tough, gutsy performance."

This was the first matchup of Nos. 1-2 since top-ranked North Carolina beat Georgia Tech 78-77 on Feb. 4, 1986, and that was also a road victory. Kansas coach Roy Williams was a member of Dean Smith's staff in the game.

Kansas had rallied from a 63-53 deficit to tie the score at 64-64 with 5:33 to play. The Jayhawks used their bench and went inside to score, usually the Tigers' strongpoint.

Peeler, who leads the Tigers at 18.7 points per game, broke the tie for good when he scored on an offensive rebound, the Tigers' third in the sequence, with 4:58 left. The play followed a timeout called by Missouri coach Norm Stewart.

Doug Smith, the Tigers' second-leading scorer at 18.6, then made two free throws — just his second and third points of the half — and Missouri was on a 9-2 run which put the game away.

Kansas did get within 73-71 on a 3-pointer by Kevin Pritchard with 1:09 to play, but freshman Travis Ford then made two free throws and Peeler added two more for the final margin.

Nathan Buntin added 16 points for Missouri, while John McIntyre had 15 and Smith 12.

Snyder, Mason look to be keeping Kansans home

Scott Paske

Chalk Talk

Today's the day when maybes become definitives.

The national college football letter-of-intent signing period begins for high school and junior college prospects, and it will end next Wednesday. The courtships between coaching staffs and recruits are at the crossroad, and Wildcat coach Bill Snyder and his assistants are hoping to funnel prospects in their direction.

This is Snyder's first full season of selling the K-State grid program. His effort was delayed last year when Snyder was still an assistant to Hayden Fry at Iowa. The Hawkeyes played in the 1988 Peach Bowl, keeping him out of Manhattan until after the New Year.

It's been evident that Snyder's been around town during the current off-season. He's spent some time roaming the hallways of Manhattan High School, and it looks as if he'll walk out with four prizes.

Indian seniors Roy Stone, Kelly Greene, Jeff Placek and Laird Veatch have all given their word they will sign on the dotted line with the 'Cats today.

The four standouts highlight significant progress that the state's NCAA Division I-A coaches are making in keeping Kansas prepsters close to home. Snyder and University of Kansas coach Glen Mason are both expecting to land several area stars.

Mason is expected to ink two top prospects in Leavenworth's Steve Harvey and Rodney Harris of Kansas City-Washington. Harvey, a 6-foot-4, 240-pounder, played fullback and linebacker last season.

Harris, who played tight end and defensive end, will give former KU signal caller Kelly Donohoe's replacement a big target. He stands 6-foot-7 and weighs 210 pounds.

In the past, numerous in-state prospects have opted for greener pastures elsewhere. Many of them, including 1988 Heisman Trophy winner Barry Sanders (Wichita North and Oklahoma State running back), have come back to haunt the 'Cats and Jayhawks.

The only all-state pick expected to leave Kansas this season is El Dorado offensive lineman Shawn Miller. Miller, a 6-foot-4, 230-pounder, has verbally committed to Michigan.

Snyder's crop of Kansas talent will come from various regions of the state. Oral commitments have been received from westerners Keith Galindo of Dodge City and Oliver Salmans from Hanston. Salmans, who led his team to an 8-man state title this past season, rushed for over 5,000 yards in his career.

K-State should also receive help from the eastern part of the state. Atchison's Jason Krone and Perry-Leocompton's Chuck Culver have had the 'Cats atop their respective lists of schools.

Running back Leon Edwards, who led the Wichita City League in rushing last season at Southeast High School, has K-State on his list. Edwards reportedly must first pass an ACT exam to be eligible at the Division I level.

One of K-State's glaring needs is depth on the offensive and defensive lines, and Snyder may have found some help outside of Kansas. Barrett Brooks, a 6-foot-5, 270-pounder from St. Louis McCluer North High School, has put K-State high on his list.

Texas' prep ranks have always been a valuable resource to K-State, as 19 players appeared on last year's roster. A pair of San Antonio natives are on the list of possible signees in Desi Griffin and Kevin Peltier. The pair were teammates at Sam Houston High School.

Griffin, 5-7, 145, has narrowed his choices to K-State, Eastern New Mexico and Ivy League schools Columbia and Pennsylvania. He played quarterback in high school, but the 'Cats were looking at him for a wide receiver or defensive back.

Texas, Southern Methodist and Southwest Texas State are reported to be in the hunt for Peltier, a 5-10, 180-pound defensive back.

As the signing date has approached, Snyder has been difficult to contact. NCAA rules prevent him from commenting on individual prospects until they have signed. He has also decided not to make any general comments regarding the progress made during the off-season.

So, in keeping with the suspense, everybody will just have to wait until Snyder opens his presents today.

Douglas officially champ

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Now, the boxing world agrees: Buster Douglas is heavyweight champion.

And there apparently is agreement on another front: His first challenger will be Mike Tyson.

Douglas-Tyson II came close to clearing the final hurdle Tuesday when Evander Holyfield's manager, Ken Sanders, said in Atlanta that his boxer probably would step aside to allow the rematch.

Billionaire developer Donald Trump says Douglas-Tyson II will be June 18 in Atlantic City, although Douglas has not signed a contract.

In fact, Douglas only learned hours earlier that he was undisputed champion when the World Boxing Association finally recognized him for his knockout of Tyson.

Wildcats eye another win over Sooners

By Scott Paske
Sports Reporter

173, 146, 142, 134, 130 .... The numbers resemble incredible marks on IQ tests or poor batting averages.

For Oklahoma, however, they represent the number of times the Lloyd Noble Center scoreboard operator has pushed his red button in different games this season after the home team scores a basket.

The victims: U.S. International, Northeast Illinois, James Madison, Arkansas-Little Rock and Angelo State.

K-State, 14-10 overall and 4-4 in league play, will try to make the scorekeeper's job less hectic tonight in an 8:05 contest with the No. 11 Oklahoma Sooners. The game will be televised by Creative Sports Marketing.

It is the first of four remaining regular season road games for the 'Cats. They must also venture to Iowa State, No. 1 Kansas and No. 2 Missouri. "Oklahoma's a ball club that plays well anywhere, but traditionally plays even better at home," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "They play with a lot of confidence and shoot the ball well there. It will be very difficult."

The Sooners' record at Noble is mind-boggling. OU has won 41 in a row at home, the second-longest streak in the country behind Arizona.

But if any team has a semi-hex on Oklahoma, it would be the 'Cats. K-State was the last opponent to win in Norman, stealing a 90-89 decision in 1987.

Perhaps a sweeter moment for K-State occurred Jan. 16, in Bramlage Coliseum, when the 'Cats smothered the high-powered Sooner offense in a 66-51 win on ESPN. Oklahoma, ranked third in the country at the time, shot just 29.4 percent from the field and tallied its lowest point total of the season. In addition to the superb defensive effort that night, K-State's success against OU's press contributed to the upset.

"My opinion's always been that you have to try to handle their full-court pressure," Kruger said. "If you can't do that, then the defense creates a lot of scoring opportunities for the offense."

"Steve (Henson) and the other guards did an awfully good job of handling that, but it's a lot more intense in Norman."

The intensity has resulted in points — lots of them. Oklahoma is averaging 121.7 points at Noble, and has been held under 100 just once in an 89-81 win over Nevada-Las Vegas.

All five OU starters average in double figures, led by senior Skeeter Henry's 18.5 points per game. Henry, a 6-foot-7 guard, was involved in the spitting incident with K-State guard Jean Derouillere in the two teams' first meeting.

Kruger said the Sooners' balance makes developing a strategy more difficult.

"It's just so hard to point to one guy," he said. "When you prepare for Colorado, you're talking about (Shaun) Vandiver, (Stevie) Wise and (Reggie) Morton as priorities. When we prepare for Oklahoma, we really don't do that."

K-State, a winner in its last two ball games, created renewed hope for an NCAA Tournament bid with Thursday's upset of then-No. 1 Missouri. However, Kruger said having four of the last six games on the road provides few positive aspects.

"It's quite the opposite," Kruger said. "When you've got four games at places like Norman, Ames, Lawrence and Columbia, ... that really doesn't favor us at all."

"Since we were the first team to beat Oklahoma, I'm sure they'll be pumped sky-high to avenge the loss."

Dave Mayes/Staff

Oklahoma coach Billy Tubbs and his Sooners will get their long-awaited rematch with the 'Cats tonight at 8:05 in the Lloyd Noble Center.

Marilyn Monroe's life studied

Series examines triumphs and tragedies of screen legend

Richard Jones

REVIEW

"I used to think as I looked out on the Hollywood night, 'There must be thousands of girls sitting alone like me, dreaming of becoming a movie star. But I'm not going to worry about them. I'm dreaming the hardest.'" — Marilyn Monroe

She was born Norma Jeane Baker. There was no national celebration on the day of her birth. It was no more recognized than most new arrivals. Thirty-six years later, after changing her name, surviving the collapse of two well-publicized marriages and creating a silver screen legacy that would span generations, she was gone. Unlike her birth, the death of Marilyn Monroe was acknowledged and mourned around the world.

This is the first in a series of articles about Monroe's life and career.

Information comes from "Goddess: The Secret Lives of Marilyn Monroe," an intriguing biography by Anthony Summers.

She was born to Gladys Monroe June 1, 1926 in Los Angeles General Hospital. The identity of her father was as much of a mystery to her as it still is to the rest of the world.

When Norma Jeane was seven, her mother succumbed to her family's history of mental illness and was committed to the very same hospital in which her grandmother had died.

This launched Norma Jeane into a series of no less than eleven foster homes as well as two years in Los Angeles' Orphan's Home. She was finally placed into the family of Grace McKee, a court-appointed guardian, whom Norma Jeane lived with for four years.

Her stay with the McKee's ended as they made the decision to move and were unable to continue to care for her. In an attempt to keep Norma Jeane from being placed back in the orphanage, Grace McKee arranged for her to be married to 21-year-old Jim Dougherty.

On June 19, 1942, Norma Jeane, then 16, became Dougherty's wife.

Slightly more than a year later, Dougherty joined the Merchant Marines and, a year after that, was stationed in New Guinea. Norma Jeane stayed behind and lived with her mother-in-law.

She took a job at Radio Plane, where she inspected parachutes. It was there, on the assembly line, that Norma Jeane was discovered.

A photographer for an armed service motion picture unit was assigned to take pictures of attractive girls for "Yank" magazine. The photographer was David Conover, a private working under commanding officer Capt. Ronald Reagan, who would one day be president of the United States.

It was Conover who first hired Norma Jeane as a model and his photographs sparked her career.

As her career grew, so did the recognition of the name Norma Jeane Baker. Faced with the likelihood of a movie contract, Ben Lyon, casting director at 20th Century Fox, gave Norma Jeane a new name. It was decided that she would be known as Carolee Lind.

Soon, however, Lyon and his wife, actress Bebe Daniels, met with Norma Jeane in an attempt to find a better name. Lyon hit on the idea of Marilyn, taken after former actress Marilyn Miller.

It was Norma Jeane herself who suggested the last name of Monroe in an attempt to keep her grandmother's last name. So it was that this Hollywood newcomer would be known as Marilyn Monroe.

The 1947 film, "Scudda Hoo! Scudda Hay!" was the first one in which Marilyn appeared. She was nothing more than an extra, and the end result of that film is a distant shot of Marilyn paddling a canoe and another in which she simply says, "Hello."

Marilyn would appear in no less than 20 movies. This series will review some of her finest films, many of which can be found in the classic section of video stores.

The series will begin with a review of "Niagara" and follow chronologically through Marilyn's highly impressive career, ending with what I consider to be the finest film of her screen legacy, "The Misfits."

Women's Studies focuses on gender

By Sandy Hegarty
Collegian Reporter

The subject is women, but that includes more than just the "great" women who broke down the walls of sex roles and achieved honor in fields reserved for men.

The Women's Studies Program at the University is concerned with the world's approach toward women and the questions concerning gender roles.

"The point isn't women, the point is gender," said Sandra Coyner, director for women's studies. "Our society is gender-oriented and culture makes gender."

Women's studies was founded and approved by the Board of Regents in 1977 to serve students wishing to take courses focusing on women. It was the first interdisciplinary secondary major program approved by K-State.

The focus came in the early 1970s when people realized most studies were for and about white men, Coyner said, and it wasn't an accurate measure of the population.

Several women faculty helped organize the program in certain departments. Other departments agreed a change was needed and are offering to deliver feminist classes.

"Some students will be exposed, but it should be in every course that deals with human beings to be fair," Coyner said. "It's hard to change old ways."

The program has no control over what the other departments offer. Coyner said each department contributes a little to the program, and some departments are more supportive than others. Some just can't afford to contribute, she said.

Enrollment in the Introduction to Women's Studies class is up from 20 students in 1978 to 250 in 1990, and not enough faculty are available to staff these classes. About 30 courses focusing on women's studies are taught by about 30 faculty.

"Women's studies is an academic program," Coyner said. "We do the work of a department without the structure of one."

All undergraduates are eligible to take a secondary major in women's studies, regardless of their college or major.

It requires two interdisciplinary courses (the Introduction and Senior Seminar courses) and 18 hours of approved electives taken from at least two colleges for a total of 24 credit hours.

To my Heckler,
You've given me laughter, you've given me tears, you've given me memories, you've given me fears... you stole my heart! I'll never forget you, Beautiful.

Love, Ann
Dick, I loved you then, I love you now, and I'll love you forever. Happy V-Day as we start the rest of our lives together.

Love, Your Baby
My Dear Sweetie, Care for a stroll down memory lane? How about the evening we met "Outback" and danced to "Angel"; the nights we sat by Anderson and talked into the wee hours of the morning; that Shmucky-La-Roo and the underwear; the lavender; walks in the snow; skidding through the park behind a Honda; Formal; the phone bill over X-mas break; and, of course, waking up in your arms... who could ask for a better five months? I know there are many more to come, for I love you with all my heart. Always, Your Baby.

Love, De
To my CUTIE PATOOTIE—
A dream lives on forever & so will the love we share. Happy Valentines Day from your fiance-girl.

Love, Angie

Valentines

Return to tradition

By Tim Clopton
Collegian Reporter

Hearts skip a beat, palms begin to sweat, and sleep is all but lost. Valentine's Day is here, and Cupid has gotten his archery set out once again.

Instead of singing telegrams and humorous messages, this year's romantics are taking a serious approach. People are choosing more traditional gifts for their prospective valentines, according to local merchants.

"Most of our orders have been real traditional this year, such as a dozen red roses," Susan Doughty, manager of Steve's Floral in Aggieville, said.

Greeting cards are also going back to more serious and traditional styles.

Karen Brown, manager of Arbutnot's Hallmark, said Hallmark has come out with a historical collection of Valentine's Day cards, which has sold well, she said.

"People are reminiscent of the older cards like the pop-out cards and the lacey, flowery ones," Brown said. "People are buying the more traditional cards because we haven't had many of them around the last couple of years."

In the past few years, humorous Valentine's Day cards were popular, and many of the more traditional items declined in sales, Brown said. The trend has reversed in 1990.

"We are still selling the humorous cards, but the traditional cards are selling much better," Brown said. "We are also selling a lot of the traditional heart-shaped boxes of candy."

Although the more traditional gifts are regaining popularity, some of the more recent trends still have appeal, Doughty said.

"We are getting a lot of orders for balloon bouquets attached to stuffed animals or candy, as well as orders for pink and yellow roses," Doughty said.

Valentine messages began to be written on cards in the middle of the 18th century in some areas of Germany, according to Frank Staff, in his book "The Valentine and Its Origins."

The first cards, called visiting cards, had pictures or designs around the borders, Staff wrote. The name of the sender was written in the middle.

According to the book, messages were added in later years, and more intricate drawings were put on them by exceptional artists.

Red roses make some people blue

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Sending a dozen red roses on Valentine's day may be the ultimate compliment for American sweethearts, but don't try it in Mexico or Spain.

In Mexico, according to FTD and Interflora Inc., which send flowers by wire to more than 139 countries, the color red is used to cast spells. If perchance you err and haven't yet become a toad, rush a white bouquet to lift the spell.

It isn't that the Spanish dislike red, it's just that in Spain red roses are associated more with lust than love. So purchase them at your own risk or settle for another color.

Heather Kelly of Roses Inc., the international trade association of rose growers based in Haslett, Mich., says Americans will buy some 43.2 million roses in the 24 hours leading up to Feb. 14. That means 30,000 a minute, 3.6 million dozens.

"Seventy percent of the roses will be red," she says, "though there's a growing interest in yellow and pink."

There's also a growing interest in buying roses not by the dozen but by the number of years couples have been together. "It'll be great for the industry when they reach 20," Kelly adds.

While pink is okay, never send a dozen yellow roses to a French valentine. Yellow suggests infidelity.

The French also consider unlucky cut flowers of any color or ilk sent by the dozen or any other even number. So is a bouquet of 13. Both yellow and the number 13 are also no-nos in Latin America, except that yellow is associated with death rather than infidelity.

Roses are okay as tokens of affection in Italy, so long as they are in odd numbers and sent to women only.

Wife-to-be begins princess studies

By The Associated Press

TOKYO — What does it take to become a princess? It takes class. Lots of them, nearly every day.

During the next month, 13 carefully selected tutors will try to instill a royal aura in Kiko Kawashima, a college student who will wed Emperor Akihito's younger son in June.

With a notebook clutched to her chest and her hair pulled back in a ponytail, Kawashima arrived at the palace Tuesday morning in a black, chauffeur-driven limousine to begin her "princess studies."

The first class on the agenda was religious rites and coronation ceremonies. The teacher was Torahiko Nagazumi, a former chamberlain and classmate of the late Emperor Hirohito.

Kawashima's curriculum, worked out by the Imperial Household Agency, will cover eight topics: classical poetry, calligraphy, Japanese history, palace rituals, laws related to the imperial family, the imperial system, the constitution and religious ceremonies.

The quiet 23-year-old, who already has won over the nation with her shy smile, is to attend 28 hours of classes spread out over the next month. Many Japanese women also attend classes before getting married, but for most, flower arrangement, cooking and the tea ceremony are the popular subjects.

The palace timed the classes to coincide with spring vacation at the prestigious Gakushuin University, where Kawashima is a graduate student of psychology and where her father teaches economics.

The briefness of her royal studies — Empress Michiko's lasted nearly twice as long — reflects the omission of English, since she learned that language while living in the United States as a child.

And as the wife of Prince Aya, who is second in line to the throne, less will be required of her than of the woman who marries Aya's elder brother, Crown Prince Naruhito.

The government plans to spend roughly $1 million on the June 29 wedding for Kawashima and Aya, who is 24.

Naruhito has said he would like to marry by the age of 30, but he will reach that landmark later this month and is having trouble finding a suitable mate.

A recent article in a conservative weekly magazine, Shukan Shincho, expressed fear that because of Kawashima's lack of noble background, 28 hours will not be enough time to prepare her.

Mobster lures psychologist to gamble

Mark Schreiner

REVIEW

"House of Games," directed and written by renowned playwright David Mamet, is a film that weaves a tangled plot of confidence scams and counter-cons similar to "The Sting," stacking the deck so nothing is certain until the film's central house of cards tumbles in the final frames. Mamet's non-psychological thriller centers on Margaret Ford, played by Lindsay Crouse. Ford is a Freudian psychologist and author of the best-selling book "Driven: Obsession and Compulsion in Everyday Life." Ford, however, is herself a chain-smoking, frustrated workaholic.

"Why do we listen to our patients' troubles when we can't help them?" she says. "It's a scam, a con."

This changes when a patient who has just gambled away $25,000 sticks a gun to his head. When Ford offers to help him in exchange for the gun, he complies. He asks her to get his bookie, Mike, to forgive the debt.

Dark-haired, unshaven Mike, played by Joe Mantegna, looks like a mobster. He's always analyzing people to detect their "tell," the little habit that tells him what they are thinking, if they are bluffing, and when they will throw to first.

Ford meets Mike in the "House of Games," a pool-and-poker pub. He quickly analyzes the psychoanalyst and decides they both have something the other needs. He agrees to forgive Ford's patient's debt if she'll do him a favor. Mamet scripts the scene in the repetitively tense, straining fashion of all the film's dialogue:

Mike: "I want you to do something."

Ford: "What do you want me to do?"

Mike: "I'll tell you what I want you to do."

Ford: "What do you want me to do?"

Mike: "A favor."

Ford: "What is the favor?"

Mike wants Ford to help him cheat in a high-stakes poker game in the bar's backroom. Ford, eager for excitement, agrees. From there, Mike and his cohorts suck her into their whirling, murky world.

That's all of the plot I'll divulge, but even that little bit of knowledge is dangerous, because as the movie progresses, nearly every detail folds back on itself and is revealed as something other than what it seemed.

The con artists' tricks are the film's strengths. The quick-buck games that Mike and his henchmen show Ford seem clever enough to work in real life. "What's more fun than human nature?" Mike says. They put Face from "The A-Team" to shame.

But unlike "The A-Team," the bad guys in "House of Games" really are bad. Mike justifies cons as "only business — the American way." After a particularly beautiful scam, he says, "Years from now, you'll have to go to a museum to see a con like this."

Mike claims to sell confidence. "It's called a con game. Why? Because you give me your confidence?"

No. I give you mine.

"I give that guy my confidence. He gives me his help. He gets to feel like he's a good guy."

Ford needs Mike's confidence. She doesn't live, she observes. Throughout the film, she watches and poses questions as if she was a computerized personality analyzer.

A patient undergoing therapy asks her, "Do you think you are exempt from experience?" Ford can only reply, "Why do you ask me that?"

When her patient complains that therapy is only talk — a big con game — Ford asks her why she thinks it's a con game. This endless banter of statement and question and the continuous puns in "House of Games" attests to Mamet's love for word play and is one of the film's strengths.

Other strong points are Mamet's realistically predatory world and Mike's wisdom. Mike teaches Ford about her own specialty, the psychology of obsession. "There are things we do, and things we want," he says. "We can do them or not do them, but we still want them."

A Union Program Council Kaleidoscope film, "House of Games" lasts 102 minutes and is rated R. The 1987 film will show at 7 p.m. Wednesday in Forum Hall, 3:30 Thursday in the Little Theatre and 7 p.m. Thursday in Forum Hall.

Program schedule changed

By Lori Antrim
Collegian Reporter

KSDB-FM has rearranged its program schedule to help attract some of the listeners and sponsors of KSKT and fill the void left by the station when it closed.

The changes, which became effective Feb. 1, included moving the Jazz in the Morning program to the weekends. The station will now play new album rock from 6 a.m. until sign-off at 1 a.m. weekdays.

The Rock of Ages classic rock program now airs at 6 p.m. on Saturday and 9 p.m. on Sunday. Jam the Box, which plays urban contemporary music, was moved from Saturday to Friday night and will start at 6 p.m.

Another reason for some of the program changes is because disc jockey Phil Canty, who did Jam the Box, was hired by KJCK-FM to do a similar show. Jam the Box was changed to Friday night to help avoid the competition, said Joe Montgomery, station manager.

Montgomery said part of KSDB program policy is to provide alternative programming to the Manhattan market. Because KSKT offered classic rock and several Top 40 and country stations are already on the air, it was suggested that KSDB should try to take up some of the slack KSKT left in the market.

"KSDB slants toward alternative and new artists," Montgomery said. "They do play some established artists, but once the artists become more common we stop playing them or play them less."

From the management standpoint, trying to find a student DJ for Jazz in the Morning isn't easy to do, he said, and the station was getting complaints that the jazz it played wasn't "pure enough." Students are more willing to DJ for a rock 'n' roll program.

David Zeinik, graduate student in psychology, cues a song for radio air time at the KSDB-FM 91.9 studio Tuesday afternoon.

Montgomery said the KSDB executive staff voted to change. The executive staff includes the student director, the news director, music director, production director, sports director and underwriting director. After much debate it was decided to move the jazz program to weekend mornings.

"We only do underwritings and it was hard to underwrite the jazz program. I think we'll do better with album rock," Montgomery said.

More tolerance for different music formats exists in this market, he said.

The stations have shortchanged people because they are not willing to take a chance and play basically the same format, Montgomery said.

Jam the Box is strong with faculty and students.

"We still have a strong audience for alternative music and we won't turn our back on them," Montgomery said. "If we were competitive, I think we'd do really well."

Rec expansion discussed

Task force sets priorities to improve recreational facilities

By The Collegian Staff

The Recreational Services Task Force discussed its goals and priorities for improving campus recreational facilities in its first meeting Monday.

"I think we need to expand our Rec Services programs," said Pat Bosco, dean of student life.

Bosco said he would like the task force to look closely at the present programs offered by Recreational Services, what the future needs will be and how these needs will be financed. Some of the projects being considered are an addition to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and renovations in Ahearn Field House.

"The direction we're taking is to look at all the options," Student Body President Todd Johnson said.

One possibility for financing future needs is to continue the $22-per-semester fee students pay towards the retirement of bonds used to construct the Rec Complex, KSU Stadium and the K-State Union.

"This is something we can't expect the state to pay for," Johnson said. "We're not looking at a fee increase. We're looking at using the existing fee."

He said the increase in enrollment could result in the existing bonds being paid off as early as 1992.

"That's been the K-State way," Bosco said. "Our students are willing to look to the future."

Raydon Robel, director of Recreational Services, distributed to task force members copies of a survey on Recreational Services use conducted by Ron Downey of University Planning and Evaluation Services.

According to the survey, 78 percent of students participate in Recreational Services programs. The survey was mailed to 1,500 students and had a response rate of 38 percent.

Recreational Services Council last year requested a task force be organized to look at overcrowding problems at the Rec Complex. The task force was set up through Bosco's office and the members were selected by himself and Johnson.

The majority of the task force is comprised of students, with Johnson as the chairman. Student Senate representatives to the task force are Marvin Peck, sophomore in business, and Dennis O'Keefe, sophomore in business. Two more Student Senators will be appointed, Johnson said. Enita Rief, sophomore in animal science and industry, will represent Recreational Services Council.

Students representing different living groups are: Ginger Cline, Panhellenic Council president; Monty McClain, Interfraternity council president and Mark Reams, KSUARH president.

Non-student members of the task force include: Robel; Larry Noble, head of the department of physical education and leisure studies; Dallas Johnson, professor of statistics; Peggie Armour, office assistant for the dean of architecture and design and David Saueressig from the Division of Continuing Education. The task force also will include another faculty member and a representative from the athletic department.

Winds could drive oil onshore; wildlife sanctuaries endangered

By The Associated Press

HUNTINGTON BEACH, Calif. — Blustery winds threatened to push more goo onto California beaches Tuesday as reinforcements joined the battle to sop up the oily onslaught a week after a tanker spill fouled the coast.

The cleanup crew was tripled to 1,120 workers on six miles of oil-stained beach and another 300 workers were being trained to handle the crude oil invasion. Fifteen miles of beach in Southern California remained closed.

Meanwhile, the 811-foot tanker American Trader docked for repairs.

Winds combined with increasing surf to push new bands of thick crude ashore, threatening wildlife sanctuaries. The 400,000-gallon spill has killed 86 birds and coated 261 others with oil.

The National Weather Service said onshore winds to 40 mph could develop by Thursday.

Gov. George Deukmejian was expected to act Tuesday on an emergency declaration request by Huntington Beach Mayor Tom Mays. Huntington Beach is about 35 miles southeast of Los Angeles.

Waves of grimy crude oil spilled by the American Trader rolled onto Bolsa Chica State Beach, leaving the beach coated with a layer of crude 2 inches thick in some areas.

The oily pads, absorbent pompons and truck loads of gooey sand were taken to a seven-acre site near the Newport Beach sewage treatment plant, said Tony Kozlowski of British Petroleum America Inc., which owns the Alaska North Slope oil and chartered the ship.

He said the muck can be picked up easier once it's on the beach.

"When it gets on shore we can deal with it and clean it up. When it's out there it's just a waiting game," Kozlowski said.

Ethnic riots kill 7 people

Armenian families receive housing preference

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Armenians by the hundreds have fled the Tadjikistan capital of Dushanbe to escape ethnic rioting that has killed at least seven people and injured more than 100, news reports said Tuesday.

Soldiers in tanks and armored personnel carriers were reportedly in control of the central Asian city 1,600 miles from Moscow, but violence was spreading to the suburbs, said Anatoly Larenok, a correspondent for the national newspaper Vozdushny Transport.

"There are tanks guarding key buildings in the center of the city, and the riots have moved to the suburbs," he said.

Violence broke out in Dushanbe on Monday after rumors spread that thousands of Armenian refugees — already fleeing ethnic clashes with Azerbaijanis in the Caucasus — were being given preference for scarce new housing.

There is a chronic housing shortage in Dushanbe for Tadjik families, which traditionally are large.

Television news Tuesday evening said the ethnic attacks were continuing, and showed film footage of bloody clashes between rioters and rows of police, smashed vehicles, and shattered storefronts.

The report showed a smiling old man stepping out of a broken store window with his arms full of cartons of milk.

Larenok said at least 300 Armenians had fled the city aboard special flights to Yerevan, the Armenian capital, and many others had left on regular flights.

About 30 people were arrested for taking part in the violence, the television said.

Ethnic tensions also were reported high in Frunze, capital of the neighboring republic of Kirgizia on the border with China, following rumors that Armenian refugees were to receive apartments in the city, the Komsomolskaya Pravda said. No violence was reported there.

Zaniddin Nasreddinov, an editor at the Tajikistan news agency, reported another rally in the center of Dushanbe Tuesday morning, but said there was no violence. Communist Party leaders spoke to the crowd and assured them that all Armenian refugees had left the city, he said.

The demonstrators elected a committee of 12 to represent the public in negotiations with authorities on issues such as the current ethnic strife, housing and unemployment, Nasreddinov said.

Interfax, a publication of official Radio Moscow, said the crowd demanded the deportation of all Armenians from Tadjikistan, the closure of an ecologically dangerous aluminum plant, the return to the republic of all proceeds from cotton production, and the resignations of the Communist Party and government leadership.

The official Tass news agency, contradicting the TV report of continuing attacks, said Dushanbe was calm Tuesday but "still very tense."

An official with the Interior Ministry who declined to give his name said the situation remained "serious" Tuesday night.

A state of emergency was declared Monday and a 10 p.m.-6 a.m. curfew was imposed, Tass said. The curfew remained in effect Tuesday night.

Tass said precise casualty figures were unavailable, but preliminary reports showed that at least seven people had died in the rioting and 108 were injured when young Tadjiks stormed the Communist Party headquarters and went on a rampage in the city.

The news agency said a small crowd that had gathered in front of the building Monday morning swelled to a rally of at least 4,000 later in the day.

Communist Party First Secretary Kakhar Makhkamov and other members of the government told the crowd that only about 40 refugees were in Dushanbe, and they were living with relatives, Tass said.

Two Americans kidnapped; guerrillas protest Bush's visit

By The Associated Press

CARTAGENA, Colombia — Leftist guerrillas kidnapped two Americans Tuesday to protest President Bush's visit for a drug summit and said they would put their captives on trial, police said. One was later reported released.

The Americans, abducted in the drug capital of Medellin, were identified as David Kent, a teacher, and James Archer Donnelly, a businessman, a police spokesman told The Associated Press.

Donnelly was released unhurt at 10:30 a.m., about three hours after he was kidnapped, said an official at the school where Kent is a teacher. He was released along with his Colombian girlfriend, the official said on condition of anonymity.

The school official said Donnelly was told by his captors that they were leftist guerrillas and had taken the action to protest Bush's visit Thursday for a four-nation drug summit.

In Washington, the State Department confirmed the kidnappings but said Donnelly was kidnapped Monday night. It had no immediate comment on his reported release.

The Colombian radio network Caracol said its Medellin station received a telephone call from an anonymous man, claiming to be a spokesman for leftist guerrillas, who claimed responsibility for the abductions.

The caller said the men would be put on trial and would be released in five days, Caracol said.

Property tax issue back in Legislature

State lottery under scrutiny; interstate banking considered

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Property taxes were back in the legislative spotlight Tuesday, but lawmakers appeared to be no closer to a solution after a brief respite from the issue.

Legislators also took a look at creating admissions standards for Kansas universities and at allowing interstate banking, while the state lottery came under critical scrutiny.

The House Tax Committee heard testimony, much of it critical, on a proposal from the 10 House members from Wyandotte County. It is designed to decrease the property taxes of small businesses and homeowners by increasing the taxes of businesses that received the biggest break from a 1986 tax classification amendment approved by voters.

Meanwhile, House Minority Leader Marvin Barkis of Louisburg introduced a similar plan, billing it as an alternative to Republican Gov. Mike Hayden's proposed "Kansas Proposition 13" tax rollback amendment.

In the Barkis and Wyandotte County plans, the proposed amendment would put a new tax classification scheme in the constitution, reacting to critics' contention that the present system shifted too much of the tax burden from large businesses to small businesses and homeowners.

Eight proposed property tax constitutional amendments have been introduced during the 1990 Legislature.

Property tax is not the only issue where many lawmakers believe there is a problem but no one can agree on how to solve it. It seems to be true of some education issues.

That was apparent as the House Appropriations Committee heard testimony from representatives of the Board of Regents, making yet another attempt at setting admissions requirements for students entering regents' institutions.

Regents' Executive Director Stan Koplik said he wants the committee to introduce the bill instead of the House Education Committee because the proposal needs a change of scenery. A "qualified admissions" proposal died in the House last year.

A number of Appropriations Committee members support the idea, he said.

Supporters said the proposed system would give students a better shot at success, while opponents either disagreed there was a problem or said there was a better way to achieve success.

Bill Curtis, lobbyist for the Kansas Association of School Boards, told the committee he didn't think there was a problem with the quality of students' education or in the preparation they received in public schools.

"I'm very disappointed in the testimony," responded Rep. Wanda Fuller, R-Wichita.

Fuller said business people are telling legislators that young people are unprepared to enter the business world. She said the Board of Regents wouldn't be asking for tighter admission standards if public schools were doing a better job.

Some lawmakers would have liked higher standards for the Kansas Lottery during its first year of operation.

The House Federal and State Affairs Committee reviewed the findings of an audit of the lottery's finances, showing it took in less money in sales than it spent during the fiscal year that ended June 30, 1989.

The audit also questioned administrative expenses of the agency, noting that during the last fiscal year, its expenses for such things as equipment, salaries and professional services were significantly higher than the average in several other states.

Some legislators said the audit paints a troubling picture of the agency's management by its first director, Larry Montgomery.

Montgomery was replaced by Jerry Simpson in September, after

"I don't think Mr. Montgomery was honest with this committee or with the Legislature."

—Ginger Barr
state representative, R-Auburn

Montgomery took a job with a Maryland gaming research firm.

"I don't think Mr. Montgomery was honest with this committee or with the Legislature," said Rep. Ginger Barr, R-Auburn.

"I think the state of Kansas has been cheated out of millions of dollars in money because of the poor management of a system," said Rep. Kathleen Sebelius, D-Topeka.

Lawmakers also were urged to pull down a "Berlin Wall" of the banking industry — laws that prohibit interstate banking.

"We still have our Berlin Wall around the state of Kansas," said Barkley Clark, a Kansas City, Kan., attorney. "It is time for that Berlin Wall to come down for a variety of reasons."

Clark was one of five persons who testified before the Senate Financial Institutions and Insurance in support of a bill that would allow limited interstate banking in Kansas, a measure that supporters say is long overdue.

The prohibition against any out-of-state bank from buying a Kansas bank merely limits competition and restricts the market, lawmakers were told.

The bill would allow banks in Nebraska, Missouri, Oklahoma, Colorado, Arkansas and Iowa to purchase Kansas banks or bank holding companies after July 1, 1992. Kansas banks could purchase banks in those states as well.

Clark said people's fears that the bill would allow large out-of-state banks to drain Kansas of capital are unfounded. He also contested the notion that smaller banks would have less money to lend consumers.

Last week, the Iowa Legislature passed a bill that would allow interstate banking, leaving Kansas and Montana the only two states that do not allow it.

The Senate committee held public hearings on the issue last year, but did not vote on the bill to send it to the Senate.

ceremony separate from the College of Arts and Sciences' ceremony in Bramlage Coliseum.

"I personally disagree with the decision," Jurich said. "I received at least eight phone calls from students who are livid over the fact that they are now going to be in a barn with a bunch of other people."

A motion was passed by Faculty Senate to transmit strong displeasure to the counsel of academic deans on the merging of graduate students with the College of Arts and Sciences and continue a separate graduation ceremony.

Other matters senators discussed and mentioned were excusing students from their classes to participate in Associated Students of Kansas Lobby Day in Topeka on Monday, reducing and becoming aware of the cheating occurring throughout the entire University and congratulating those students who created awareness for the library at the sit-in.

ized entries have occurred in the past year, and charges have been brought in each of the instances. He said most of the trespassers appear to be students.

"In the past, the tunnels were used as hiding places or shelter for juveniles who had nowhere else to stay — either runaways or kids who had left home," he said. "We haven't noticed this in the past year."

Locking up the manholes that lead to the tunnels has been considered, McQueen said.

"We decided not to because the manholes are there for getting materials in and people out," he said. "If a worker needs out in an emergency situation, he isn't going to have time to get out his keys to unlock the manhole."

No undergraduates are majoring in women's studies, but Coyner said she would like to establish a master's program here because she believes there is an interest for it.

"The program is really impressive here at KSU," said Marlene Howe, temporary instructor in women's studies. "It may be a stronger area if there was a major."

Interest may already exist or may be new and nurtured by the academic departments, Howe said. Students need the opportunity to expand knowledge of gender, and self-knowledge leads to empowerment, she said.

The University funds the Women's Studies Program. Students can compete for national and regional awards, but no scholarships are offered.

Bush

Bush said she has experienced many "magic moments" during her year in the White House. She cited Polish Solidarity workers in Gdansk cheering George Bush and Solidarity leader Lech Walesa as an example.

"I've been so lucky because this past year George has given me a front row seat to an incredible panorama of people and places," Bush said.

Anna Perez, Barbara Bush's press secretary, said Bush made more than 150 solo appearances in 1989.

The Bushes have been married 45 years, Bush said. They have five children.

"If I ever thought that George and I would become isolated in the White House, boy, was I wrong," Bush said.

She said in the 13 months George Bush has been president, the Bush family has gained two grandchildren and six "granddogs."

Angela Smith, vice president of Black Student Union and sophomore in pre-law and English, plays her guitar which she enjoys in her spare time. Smith, an ambassador for the Black Student Union as Ms. BSU, has taken a stand for racial equality and women's rights.

By Todd Fertig
Collegian Reporter

Angela Smith wasn't sure what she had gotten herself into when she agreed to spend Martin Luther King Jr. Day speaking to grade school and high school students about cultural understanding.

Although Smith, vice president of Black Student Union and sophomore in pre-law and English, knew she'd received an exciting opportunity, she found herself having second thoughts. Speaking to young students made her apprehensive. The situation wasn't helped by the fact that there are no blacks enrolled in the three schools she would visit in northern Kansas.

"I was really nervous," Smith said. "I didn't know how to express the importance of Martin Luther King Jr. to people who'd never experienced discrimination."

She said her apprehension was relieved when she arrived at the first grade school at which she was to speak. Children were waving to her from the windows. A banner had been hung to welcome Smith and another black student, Stanton Weeks, freshman in pre-physical therapy, who would also be speaking that day.

"Those kids were so anxious to hear about people different from themselves," Smith said.

Smith said she had wanted to spend the day at special events

Student speaks of King's dream

Smith presents message of cultural understanding

honoring King in her hometown of Kansas City but later was glad she accepted the schools' invitations.

"It was a neat experience," she said. "I felt like I was playing a more practical role in the recognition of Martin Luther King Jr. Day. I was reaching out to others."

Smith has been reaching out since she came to K-State. She has participated in various efforts to promote cultural awareness and helps lead the campaign for divestment of University funds in South Africa.

Besides holding the job of vice president of BSU, she serves as Ms. BSU, an ambassador of the group.

Smith said she came from a grade school where she was one of only two black students and graduated from a predominantly white high school that was struggling through integration. She grew up recognizing and dealing with racial differences. Though Smith recalls many difficulties, she said she benefited from the experience.

"I had to work doubly hard to get anything. Nothing ever came easily," Smith said. "I didn't have any real trouble, but I always felt like I was in an environment where I was an oddball. It helped me when I got older because I was not afraid to be different."

Because Smith grew up in schools where she was a minority, she said she came to K-State as a freshman hoping she would fit in and find favorable conditions for minority students.

"But when I got here, I was disappointed at first," Smith said. "I was disappointed that there weren't a lot of things provided for minorities. But I snapped out of it when I got to know some of the other blacks who were involved and were taking a stand. So I decided that I wanted to stay here and try to make things better for others."

Smith said the University is beginning to better meet the needs of minority students, but several areas need further improvement.

Black students need positive role models, Smith said. The University needs more black professors, who will not teach only ethnic-related classes, but who will show they can be authorities in all areas, she said.

Smith said she hopes to see the graduation rate of blacks at K-State increase, and that the low graduation rate in the past is misleading.

"The low graduation rate makes it look like blacks drop out of school," Smith said.

"Actually, in many cases the school doesn't have what blacks need, so they don't want to stay here, and they move to other schools."

Smith attributed the University's improvements in minority areas to increased awareness of cultural differences and efforts to promote understanding. She said BSU has played an important role in drawing attention to minorities.

"As long as we remain vocal, things will continue to improve," Smith said. "As soon as our voice dies, so will all we've worked for."

As well as taking a stand for racial equality, Smith said she is concerned with women's rights. She said the minority woman's fight for equality is

Proposed cuts affect colleges across Kansas

By Cosima Hadidi
Staff Reporter

Gov. Mike Hayden's budget recommendations have affected cuts in the fiscal year 1990 budgets of other higher education institutions across Kansas.

The Board of Regents schools — K-State, University of Kansas, Emporia State University, Pittsburg State University, Wichita State University, Fort Hays State University — and the Kansas College of Technology suffered reductions mainly because of what is known as "the increase in shrinkage."

"Increase in shrinkage" is the amount of money anticipated to be generated from classified and unclassified positions expected to remain vacant, said John Struve, K-State budget director.

"In the past, shrinkage consisted of 2 percent of unclassified salaries and 5 percent of classified salaries without including fringe benefits," Struve said.

"This year, the governor's recommendation was to recalculate 3.2 percent to apply to benefits as well as all salaries. This increased the amount of money that is being cut tremendously."

K-State faces a reduction of $1,275,000 in money allocated for the 1990 budget and which, for the most part, has already been spent. The amount, which correlates directly to the number of unfilled classified and unclassified positions, has been divided among the various colleges.

"In deciding the amount of cuts in each college, we looked at two criteria," Struve said, "first, the vacancies already existing in the departments, which added up to roughly $750,000; second, the total amount of salaries in each college and what percent of the total they constituted."

Individual deans and vice presidents were left to decide where the cuts would be made.

"We did not tell them where to cut the money or to implement a hiring freeze," Struve said. "We left it completely up to them to make the decision."

While the recommendations for the reductions have not been finalized, the chances of them not being implemented are small.

"I don't think that the money will be restored, considering the current economic state of the state of Kansas," Struve said. "The reductions were made across all state agencies, and there is not enough money to cover everything."

At KU's Lawrence campus, the recommended reductions totaled $250,000, said Tom Rawson, associate vice chancellor for administration and finance.

"We have allocated reductions at various areas and will use different mechanisms, including the delay of filling vacancies," he said. "The regents schools are underfunded already. This will lead to further underfunding."

At WSU, the recommended amount of reduction because of the increase in shrinkage was $1.2 million, said Roger D. Lowe, vice president for administration and finance.

"This has a substantial influence on our institution. We cannot buy any additional campus equipment during the year," he said. "The curtail of employment of personnel generally affects the total operations of the institution and support units in regard to operating expenses for the various departments."

The amount of reduction recommendations for fiscal year 1991 was even larger, Lowe said.

"This is a severe blow to higher education not only at WSU, but throughout the state of Kansas. If approved, it will reduce the budget in shrinkage alone an amount that would be nearly equivalent to the total increase in our budget for the current year for the Margin of Excellence," he said.

Source: Regents schools

At Pittsburg State, the recommended reductions were $818,000, said Cliff Beougher vice president for business and financial affairs.

"We hope that the governor will restore the cuts he has recommended. In the meantime, we have taken several measures to deal with the situation," Beougher said.

One of these measures is the reconsideration of all classified and unclassified positions. If one position opens because of the resignation of an employee, the position is reviewed carefully to determine its necessity before filling it again, he said.

Another measure is for each vice president to analyze and cut operating expenses by 7 percent.

"We continue to monitor this process weekly. The operating budgets are transferred to reserve for each vice president. If the Legislature will return the money, it can then be spent by the different colleges from which it was cut," Beougher said. "If this is a one-time reduction, and the Legislature will return the '91 budget as the Board of Regents is hoping, then it may not be a lasting problem. Higher education will continue to do the best it can to operate."

At Fort Hays State, the recommended reductions were $574,340, said Dale Johansen, vice president for administration and finance.

"At this time we have no idea where the cuts are going to be made. We don't have the money and don't know where to get it from," he said.

Bush's traveling staff reduced

President refuses to meet with coca growers at summit

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush will refuse to meet with Peruvian coca growers at the Colombian drug summit and will travel to Cartagena with a sharply reduced staff because of concerns for his safety, White House officials said Wednesday.

On the eve of the one-day meeting of four hemispheric nations, the White House also retreated from previous suggestions that Bush would revive a proposal to send U.S. Navy warships into South American waters to track cocaine-trafficking planes.

White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater denounced the kidnapping of two American citizens in Colombia on Tuesday by leftist guerrillas who said they were protesting Bush's impending visit.

While saying that Bush shared concerns over the two Americans' safety, Fitzwater asserted that "the United States government cannot allow threats of terrorism to influence its policies or its activities."

Bush will fly to Colombia early Thursday, joining Presidents Virgilio Barco of Colombia, Jaime Paz Zamora of Bolivia and Alan Garcia of Peru for six hours of anti-drug talks at a heavily guarded navy base at Cartagena.

The four leaders plan to issue a joint statement pledging to cooperate in the fight against drug trafficking. Bush's summit partners were expected to press him for more economic aid to ease their farmers' shift from lucrative coca plants — used to produce cocaine — to growing legal crops.

The United States has pledged a $206 million increase in spending on military, law enforcement and economic assistance for Peru, Colombia and Bolivia next year, as part of a five-year, $2.2 billion Andean aid package.

Garcia has invited a group of Peruvian coca growers to accompany him to the Cartagena summit.

Allocations to be discussed at Student Senate

By Kirk Caraway
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate will hear first readings tonight on a variety of bills, including special allocations for the Black Student Union and the student body president's trip to Washington D.C.

The meeting begins at 7 p.m. in the Union Big Eight room.

The bill for the Washington trip asks Student Governing Association to pay $1,507.10 for air travel, lodging, food and other expenses for student body president Todd Johnson, newly appointed ASK campus director Todd Heitschmidt and ASK board Chairman Troy Lubbers.

In the past, K-State has sent one or two people on the trip. Due to a lack of funding from the state ASK office, Johnson agreed to try to get funding for Lubbers' trip. Lubbers is a former K-State student body president.

The purpose of the trip is to meet with legislators from Kansas and other states, along with officials from the Department of Education. The other ASK-member institutions are sending delegations.

The K-State group will meet the student lobby group from Minnesota to exchange ideas and methods on lobbying. Minnesota and Kansas are two of only a handful of states with statewide student lobby groups.

The trip, which has become an annual activity for the past four student body presidents, has regularly drawn criticism because it doesn't follow SGA guidelines for travel funding.

The guidelines call for a $10.50 a day stipend per person for food and lodging. This bill asks for $115 a night for four nights lodging for three, $30 per day per person for food, and ground travel expenses for five days.

"Other groups have other sources of funding through dues and fundraisers that we don't have," said Chris Kern, Senate chairman.

A twist to this year's trip is the source of the money: it will come from the ASK state account, created when Senate raised the ASK line item fee by 15 cents last spring.

The state ASK office cannot use this money, because all member institutions didn't pass the fee increase. This has left SGA with about $5,400 dollars for lobbying activities.

The allocation to the Black Student Union is $1,250 to help send 50 students to the BSU Big Eight Conference at Iowa State University in Ames.

Aireka Key, BSU president, said students at the conference will discuss issues dealing with being minority students at predominantly white universities.

"It is different for the minority student as compared to the majority student," Key said. She said 76 delegates from K-State will attend, and the $25 per student for 50 students will help them make a good showing at the conference.

"We have a lot more freshman going this year," Key said. "They are the ones who will benefit the most."

Other bills up for first readings deal with allowing the college councils to keep allocated funds not used during the fiscal year and a special allocation for a new typewriter for SGA. A bill changing the duties of the Senate intern coordinator will also be considered. Votes on these bills are scheduled for Feb. 26.

Indian jet crashes; 91 die

NEW DELHI, India (AP) — An Indian Airlines Airbus jet that had been in use only three months crashed onto a golf course and burned Wednesday short of a runway in southern India, and 91 of the 146 people on board died, officials said.

The Airbus-320 grazed a clump of trees on its final approach to Bangalore airport and caught fire when it hit the ground, about 50 yards from the runway, officials said.

The flight originated in Bombay, 530 miles northwest of Bangalore. The officials said 139 passengers and a crew of seven were on the hour-long flight and at least 55 people survived the crash, including two Americans, the airline said.

The plane's tail was intact but its fuselage was shattered and charred and the nose was smashed across the grassy plain adjacent to the airport.

No immediate cause was given for the accident.

Mirrors rocketed into space

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (AP) — Two satellites rocketed into space Wednesday on what the Air Force said was the most ambitious "Star Wars" experiment yet, testing a plan to destroy hostile missiles by bouncing laser beams off orbiting mirrors.

One satellite carried a mirror designed to reflect lasers fired from a Hawaiian mountaintop back to a ground target to test the accuracy of such a system.

The other held sensors for measuring how successfully scientists can correct distortions caused by dust, moisture and gases as the beam shoots through the atmosphere.

The satellites were carried aloft by a 12-story Delta rocket at 11:15 a.m. Nearly two hours later, the Air Force announced both were in their proper orbits.

"Both spacecraft are doing almost exactly what we expected them to do," said Air Force Col. Tom Meyer, a project official.

Meyer said the experiment was the most ambitious yet in the Pentagon's program to develop a space-based shield against missiles.

A success in the $313 million mission could help preserve the $4.5 billion that President Bush is seeking for research in budget year 1991 for the Strategic Defense Initiative, or "Star Wars." Some members of Congress want to cut that amount.

Worker slain in restaurant

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — A night employee of the Savoy Grill, a popular downtown restaurant, was found dead in a second-floor office when a day manager reported for work Wednesday.

Police said robbery is the apparent motive for the slaying of the 33-year-old worker, whose identity was withheld. Police said the office was ransacked but it was not determined this morning whether anything had been taken.

Investigators said they believe the victim was doing paperwork in the dining area after the restaurant closed when he was approached by the robber or robbers. He was taken to the office and killed, said Sgt. Gregory Mills.

Icy roads cause two deaths

TOPEKA (AP) — Motorists and pedestrians in south-central and eastern Kansas struggled to stay on the road and keep their feet Wednesday as a combination of sleet, freezing rain or drizzle and light snow coated pavements with a cover of ice.

There were scores of traffic accidents during the morning rush hour, at least two of them fatal.

Randy Ketelboeter Jr., 9, of rural Chanute, died in a three-vehicle accident on an icy bridge over the Neosho River, along Kansas 39 east of Chanute. Neosho County officials said the child was thrown from a vehicle driven by his mother after it went out of control on the ice-slick bridge, and he was pinned under another vehicle.

Vickey Robinson, 32, of Gladstone, Mo., was killed in a crash on Interstate 70 in Kansas City, Kan. It was one of four accidents along a 100-foot stretch of the icy road.

AIDS bill heard by House

TOPEKA (AP) — A House committee Wednesday heard testimony overwhelmingly in favor of a bill that would allow law enforcement or emergency personnel who may have been exposed to AIDS to require the individual who may have exposed them to the virus to be tested.

The committee took no action on that bill.

Numerous law enforcement and school personnel also testified in favor of a bill that would attempt to create a drug-free school zone around public schools.

Because of the controversy the bill created, committee Chairman Ginger Barr, R-Auburn, assigned the bill to a subcommittee headed by Rep. Dale Sprague, R-McPherson.

Seminar focuses on gerontology

By Amy D. Hadlock
Collegian Reporter

For those interested in gerontology, or the care of the elderly, the Center for Aging provides an opportunity to get involved.

"We have a regular seminar series that takes place once a month," said George Peters, director of the Center for Aging and professor of sociology. "These seminars increase involvement and awareness for the center and also create interest in other people here on campus."

The center has three different committees: education, research and outreach. Each committee helps promote the goals of the center.

The education committee is responsible for the curriculum of the undergraduate secondary major and the graduate emphasis program.

Undergraduate students can receive a secondary major in gerontology while they work toward their primary major degree, Peters said. A long-term care administration emphasis within the gerontology secondary major is also available.

Graduate students may receive an emphasis in gerontology, which is to be taken with or in addition to a disciplinary graduate degree program, he said.

Gerontology is becoming more popular, and as a result, the center is getting more students, Peters said. About 60 students are participating in the gerontology program.

The research committee conducts research on aging issues and processes for the field of gerontology, Peters said. Grants fund research on subjects such as aging services, nutrition, housing, widowhood and retirement.

Services for elderly topic of discussion

By The Collegian Staff

Compliance of services for elderly people with the Older Americans Act will be the topic of a seminar from 12:30 to 1:30 p.m. Friday in Waters 137.

The seminar, "Social Needs for the Elderly: A Crisis Rationality," is being sponsored by the K-State Center for Aging and the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work.

Allesandro Bonanno, professor in the department of rural sociology at the University of Missouri at Columbia, will lead a discussion regarding contradictions in the perceived needs of the elderly. He will also discuss the actual delivery of these services, said George Peters, director of the Center for Aging and professor of sociology.

Bonanno will discuss the informal economic systems concerning the elderly, Peters said. These informal systems include families and kin groups of the elderly and several types of support groups that help the elderly cope with life.

The Older Americans Act commits the government to caring and providing for the well-being of older people, including providing services such as health care and transportation, Peters said. It also mandates the creation of organizations that enable the Legislature to provide money for the programs.

"These programs must compete with other programs for money," Peters said. "Therefore, the programs are not always delivered as they are intended to be. They don't always turn out as well in real life as they do on paper."

Bonanno will discuss the actual delivery of these programs for the elderly and the status of their health and economic well-being.

The next seminar will feature Dwayne Alwin, professor of sociology from the University of Michigan. The topic will be "Aging, Personality and Social Change: Attitude Persistence and Change Over the Lifespan."

Lobbyists promote needs of students to state legislators

By Gregory A. Branson
Collegian Reporter

The president's office and the Student Governing Association have concentrated efforts to inform and educate state legislators on the needs of the University and its students.

Susan Peterson, assistant to the president for governmental relations, coordinates the efforts of the president's office in Topeka. Peterson came to K-State in August, and spent most of the fall getting acquainted with the University.

"I've been learning about the intricacies of the budget, the intricacies of the different programs and learning how they all fit together," Peterson said. "I've known a lot of the topics from the Topeka perspective, but now I'm learning how they relate to the individual campuses."

Peterson gets her "Topeka perspective" from working at the Capitol for 10 years. She worked with Mike Hayden for seven years, both before and after he became governor. "Most recently, I came here from the governor's office," Peterson said. "Part of that I ran the governor's campaign and part of that I was his representative in the speaker's office."

Peterson's main job is to communicate between the University and the Kansas Legislature. She takes care of the University's interests at the Capitol and helps legislators with the requests they have to different areas of the University.

As assistant in charge of governmental relations, Peterson tracks legislation from the time it is introduced to when it either passes or is voted down.

If K-State is interested in a certain piece of legislation, she watches the calendar and contacts the staff of the committee where the bill has been sent. When a date for the hearing has been set, it is her responsibility to contact the right people on campus, get their calendars cleared and help prepare them to testify before the committees. She often meets them in Topeka and makes sure they get to the hearing.

One of the main ways to sway votes in Topeka is to make sure the legislators realize how different issues affect K-State.

"I've been involved with the president in a campaign to educate the legislators, opinion leaders and policy makers on what our budget requests are and what ramifications the requests have on our campus," Peterson said.

One of Todd Johnson's responsibilities as student body president is to make sure the legislators are informed about the interests of K-State students.

Johnson appointed six people to his cabinet to represent him in Topeka. These six people, the "lobby team," are lead by Mike Steinle, Johnson's state community affairs director.

Being new this year, the lobby team has been helped by the president's office. Peterson has helped teach the lobby team how the Legislature works and what it can do as a student lobbying group. Peterson also has suggested some bills for the lobby team to focus its efforts on.

Johnson said the lobby team's focus differs from Associated Students of Kansas and the president's office in that it focuses on issues specifically from the K-State student's standpoint.

"A lot of times we take the ASK position a step further and make it K-State specific," Johnson said.

The lobby team informs Johnson what legislation is being discussed and tells him when he needs to be in Topeka to testify. It also tries to get students involved in testifying.

A member of the lobby team is in Topeka at least three or four times a week to testify or meet with legislators.

Johnson said many legislators don't realize what effect the budget cuts have on the University and its students.

"The state legislators are being hit from all sides because there is so much stuff going on," he said.

Physical education class unnecessary

Why? I ask myself, as so many born procrastinators ask themselves, why? Why me? Why do I have to go through this? Why am I here? Why, oh why did I wait so damn long to take P.E. 101?

These questions can only be answered by my conscience (because I'm lazy, that's why). But they inspire other questions, more important questions, such as why do I have to take P.E. at all? Why does anybody? And finally, is P.E. a valid university requirement? I mean, Comp one and two, sure. We all understand it is necessary to be able to express yourself on paper clearly and concisely. If more people had this opportunity, the need for Cliff's notes in this country could have been completely obliterated.

Public Speaking is likewise perfectly understandable (I should know, I managed to put that off until this semester, too). Once you've written something, presumably you want to be able to tell others about it without totally humiliating yourself. As in, "Hi, I just won the Pulitzer Prize for brilliant writing and I, uh, well, ya know ... think it's just swell."

So I'll give them Comp and Speech. But P.E.? I guess nobody wants to look at a fat person giving a speech about a book they just wrote. I think that is, in a way, the rationale behind the course — sort of a "fit for life" idea.

But is it working, or would we be better off having it easy like some students at other universities (read: University of Kansas) do. We could just amuse ourselves for a semester in some class like bowling with a P.E. line number. I decided to take the class and find out. (Actually I decided to take the class and graduate. The business school started sending me threatening letters starting with salutations like "Dear Couch Potato", and ending with things like "Love, Your Soon To Be Former College." I gave in.)

Okay, so am I fit for life yet? It's only been three weeks. I'm not even fit to get off the sofa yet. But it hasn't been quite as awful as I expected. Yet.

I figured I'd go in and moan something like "why am I here?" and some huge drill sergeant-type would scream "Because you're fat! FAT! Look at those thighs! 200 laps PRONTO! And then five zillion push-ups and sit-ups. After that we'll play ... DODGE BALL!" Then the drill sergeant would laugh like the wicked witch of the west. That's sort of how I remember P.E. in elementary school.

What I got was a nice person whom I try to remember isn't really responsible for my having to be there, telling me how all of my favorite foods are going to ruin my body or

Karin Dell'Antonia

COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

measuring my fat. (That part came true. I knew it would. Nobody should go through life without having somebody point out that they are 97 percent fat and have the endurance of a slug, not to mention the flexibility of a two by four.)

Now that I know how fit I am I've been learning exactly what level of exercise is right for me. I've got lots of exciting ideas on how to get that old heart rate right up there — at least into the triple digits. (If you're in single digits, don't try this at home. Call a mortician.)

My personal workout for the day starts by exercising the willpower — my weakest muscle. I get out of bed (maybe) and set a goal right off. I will be on time for my 8:30 class, which isn't an easy task when your willpower didn't get you out of bed until ten minutes until eight. (So much for building up the willpower). There is barely enough time to shower, blow-dry and curl the hair (men, you may want to substitute shaving) and exercise those arm muscles.

I live near Charlie's — if I was really ambitious I'd have scheduled my first class in Justin. It's in Waters. I wanted Throckmorton, but I couldn't quite face changing my major to grain science.

I'm a beginner at the workout game. The run from Waters to Calvin, after my first professor goes two minutes past the bell, gets me ready for the next phase. My favorite — trying to change my pants for P.E. in the bathroom in Ahearn without letting my socks touch the floor. Oh, you laugh, but I think I get more aerobic exercise out of hopping around than I do in the whole gym class.

That pretty much does it for the on-campus workout. Although if you're really into this, I recommend scheduling classes in Justin, then Throckmorton, then McCain, then Waters and parking at the K-State Union. Try to cut down your travelling time every day, but in the beginning, don't expect to actually attend any classes. I try to get a ride home after all that work.

There's plenty of opportunity for exertion at home, too. I like loading the dishwasher with a week's worth of dishes to tighten up the abdomen. Vacuuming is a good overall exercise, and includes some good bending for picking up those things that the vacuum just won't — your roommates, beer cans, etc.

In our apartment napping on the sofa is good exercise because the minute you lie down the phone rings. We have a really old, deep sofa that's impossible to get off of, and an answering machine you have to race to if you don't want to scream over it. On a good day, the phone might ring as many as five times in ten minutes. This also works with the shower.

As you can see, I'm getting a lot out of this. In all seriousness, I have to wonder if eight weeks of 40-minute, twice-a-week sessions is really going to do any good for a person who has no intention of exercising anyway. If it does, great, although I'd rather be taking bowling (a new social skill I could really use). If it doesn't, well, it doesn't hurt much either. And personally, I could probably use the encouragement to stay in shape.

So now I'm in P.E. — the lab anyway. I've heard there's a lecture but I think I'll leave that to future generations. Me, I'm watching slides in the library. So twice a week I learn that aerobic exercise increases cardiovascular fitness. We even get one free absence. I'm saving mine for the mile and a half run. There's a limit to how much fitness I can take. Besides, my couch misses me.

Drug testing violates privacy of applicants

As the use of drug testing becomes increasingly prevalent during the hiring process for many large companies, it is the right of the individual to know that they may face a drug test before they are hired.

According to a study conducted by Northwestern University, 6 percent of major companies requiring a drug test for employment did not inform the prospective employee prior to the physical exam that they would be tested. This is a violation of applicants' right to know what is expected of them prior to employment.

Many arguments exist against the use of drug testing for employees. This is reflected by the number of applicants nationwide who refuse to take a drug test — as many as 20 percent for some companies, according to the study.

Some say it is a violation of an individual's Constitutional rights, specifically the Fourth and Fifth Amendments. Those who argue against drug testing say it represents an illegal search and seizure; that employees who drug test, without evidence of a crime being committed, are taking advantage of an area that has yet to be challenged in the courts.

Until the issue has been settled, or at least challenged in court, candidates for jobs should be given the courtesy of being informed of what their physical exams involve. It is the right of any person to refuse to take a test for illicit drugs, if they so choose. A person's body, like their home or vehicle, should be legally protected from unrestricted and surreptitious searches.

Colombian excursion dangerous, foolhardy

Two U.S. warships, a Colombian warship, some U.S. military aircraft, dozens of Secret Service agents, about 5,000 Colombian security agents, electronic security devices and decoys will all be used to protect President Bush during the six-hour drug summit in Colombia today.

Bush and the presidents of Colombia, Bolivia and Peru will meet at a naval base on an isolated peninsula outside of Cartagena. They will be discussing ways to fight the drug problem at the production and export level.

Bush's insistence on meeting in Colombia is insane. The danger and expense involved in protecting these leaders just so they can prove they aren't intimidated by the Medellin Cartel borders on the ridiculous.

The drug problem is serious. The idea of a summit to help coordinate interdiction efforts is rational. The approach is not. It would be cheaper and safer to fly the three South American presidents to the United States and meet here for a week. The drug dealers in this country are dangerous, but don't make a practice of bombing police stations or assassinating judges, politicians and journalists.

Bush is also playing the risky aspects of this trip to his advantage. He's going to Colombia to prove he's not a wimp. All the trip proves is that he lacks common sense.

If Bush wants to prove to the public that he's a strong president, he could admit that in order to pay off the U.S. budget deficit, taxes will have to be raised. He could stop swaying on the abortion issue and advocate one side or the other. He could direct the majority of the money for the War on Drugs away from interdiction to education to reduce demand and crush the market for drugs in this country. All of these could be accomplished without leaving the Oval Office.

To Bush, all of these actions are probably even more daring than going to Colombia. It's easier for him to needlessly risk his life than to take a strong stand on important, politically controversial issues.

Keep stones on hand

"... Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune or to take arms against a sea of troubles, and by opposing end them." "Hamlet," Shakespeare

Having survived what was probably his most difficult test of power since assuming the Soviet Presidency, Mikhail Gorbachev won approval last week for stunning changes in the Soviet constitution during a secret three-day session of the Central Committee of the Soviet Communist Party. Most important: the suggested change to a democratic-style multi-party system, with a directly elected president.

However, for anyone, especially Gorbachev, to assume it will be smooth sailing from here is not thinking very realistically. Gorbachev has been critically assailed from all sides, particularly the nomenklatura, the conservative apparatchiks who wield real power in the USSR. For obvious reasons, they do not want to give it up.

Yes indeed, these are very trying times for Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev. I, for one, certainly would not want to be in his shoes.

Actually, I think I may know exactly what it would be like to be in his shoes right now. I am reminded of an event in which my brother and I, as experimentally inclined teenagers are prone to do, shot an arrow straight up into the air and out of sight. We looked at each other, realized what we had done, then ran for cover in opposite directions, all the while invoking a primal scream in duet, the likes of which John Belushi would have been proud to witness.

The arrow came down less than a yard from where we had been standing. I've never lost sight of an arrow since. Neither has my brother.

Gorbachev's policies of glasnost and pere-

Brad Seabourn

COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

stroika, policies of increased political openness and political and economic restructuring, are much like that arrow my brother and I unleashed. Once these policies of democratic reform were initiated, they were out of Gorbachev's control and, like the arrow, depending on the direction in which the events were launched, could return to the sender with devastating consequences.

Actually, there is a corollary to the arrow story.

Eldon Schwartz, a high school classmate of mine, lived down the street from our family home. Eldon was, in an often dangerous and unpredictable way, "touched." As Barney Fife often said about Ernest T. Bass, "He's a nut." Well, Eldon played with a full deck, but the deck consisted of 52 jokers, and only Eldon knew the game.

My brother and I used to go to a vacant lot to practice archery. This practice mostly consisted of firing our cache of arrows across the lot, walking to the other end to fetch them, and then firing them back. This process was repeated over and over until we tired of the walking.

One afternoon, as the aforementioned marathon was occurring, Eldon arrived with his bow, but no arrows. After observing our impractical and time-consuming practice methods, Eldon decided the best way to make things go faster and easier would be for him to stand at one end of the lot and shoot back the arrows we had just shot to him from the opposite side. Let me restate that in a more concise fashion: "We shoot at Eldon, Eldon shoots at us." "Wow," we thought, "why didn't we think of that!" Obviously, this was a committee meeting of the three simplest minds in the community.

As long as the arrows remained low, there was not much problem in anticipating the strike zone. Eldon soon tired of this however, and steadily increased the height on his shots until, you guessed it, they were going out of sight and we had no idea where they were going to land. After a few close calls, we decided to climb a rope ladder and take refuge on top of the nearby Boy Scout building, with Eldon in hot pursuit.

Not one to be daunted, Eldon decided it would be amusing to stand along the side of the building and launch arrows at a slight angle so they would land on top of the building. We were trapped like rats, and Eldon knew it.

After the second or third near-miss, my brother and I were frantic. We were about to die at the hands of an Ernest T. Bass derivative of Robin Hood, and with our own arrows no less. Oh, cruel fate!

In blind desperation, I picked up a nearby pebble not much bigger than a marble and threw it at Eldon as he rounded a corner of the building. The rock struck Eldon on the side of the head. He went down immediately and lay there, unmoving. I thought I had killed him.

By the time we had rushed down from the top of the building, Eldon was regaining his senses. To our great relief, he was unharmed. To our even greater relief, he couldn't remember a thing — didn't even know what he was doing there. My brother and I decided it was best to leave it that way.

My simple advice to President Gorbachev is this: when your back is against the wall, when the arrows get close, keep a few small stones handy.

Hayden to address Project Graduation

By The Collegian Staff

Gov. Mike Hayden will speak at 11 a.m. today at the Project Graduation Conference in the K-State Union.

The conference is aimed at Kansas high school students, said Elizabeth Day, graduate student in history and coordinator of the conference.

It will help students learn to implement prom and graduation activities that are drug- and alcohol-free, she said.

Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education services, said between 60 and 70 Kansas high schools are expected to participarticipate in the conference.

Each school will send two students and one sponsor. The sponsors will be teachers, counselors or parents, Day said.

K-State, Blue Cross and Blue Shield, and the Kansas Department of Transportation are sponsoring the conference, she said.

Frank Ybarra, Hayden's deputy press secretary, said the governor will be speaking about a program called Toward a Drug-Free Kansas, the state's effort to combat drug abuse.

Hayden will unveil new information about Kansas' Drug-Free Schools program, Ybarra said.

Rioters attack party offices

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Villagers threw firebombs and acid at troops protecting the Communist Party headquarters in the Tadzhik capital on Wednesday, but the violence eased after three leaders in the republic resigned, Soviet media said.

The three agreed to resign during a meeting of party leaders and activists who are protesting housing shortages and the arrival of Armenian refugees, said Orif Aminov of the Tadzhik branch of the state television and radio agency.

Earlier in the day, about 5,000 young men went on a rampage in the republic's capital, looting, setting fires and attacking passers-by "irrespective of nationality," the Soviet news agency Tass said.

But officials denied Soviet television reports that 37 people had been killed in the violence in Tadzhikistan, which borders Afghanistan and China. Tass said 12 people had died. Tadzhik Interior Ministry spokesman Mikhail Shtatnov reported 11 dead and 143 injured.

President Mikhail S. Gorbachev criticized the rioters and called for harsh action against them, saying the "country's destiny and the safety of our citizens is at stake."

More troops landed in Dushanbe, the capital, on Wednesday to guard strategic points and restore order, Tass said. The evening television news show Vremya showed hundreds of people facing a wall of troops carrying riot shields with a barren stretch of street between the two tense groups.

However, Shtatnov and Dushanbe-based journalist Anatoly Larenok said in telephone interviews that the troops were in full control. Larenok said they had blocked approaches to the city to prevent rioters in neighboring villages from entering.

Larenok said the crowd outside the Central Committee headquarters was demanding that victims of the three days of violence be buried in that central square.

Tass described a pitched battle between protesters and troops. It said the crowds demanded that the leaders resign and that all Armenians in the republic be expelled.

"Militants have been making attempts to reach the Tadzhik Communist Party headquarters since this morning," Tass said Wednesday. "Crowds throw gasoline bombs, bottles with sulphuric acid and stones at troops blocking the building's entrances."

Lady Cats atop conference after win

By Scott Paske
Sports Reporter

The way things were going, it was hard to imagine that the Lady Cats could have lost to the Oklahoma Sooners Wednesday in Bramlage Coliseum.

But then again ... Oklahoma, the last-place team in the Big Eight Conference, pressed and pounded its way back from a 16-point second-half deficit. But K-State, which had all five starters in double figures, held on for a 92-88 win.

The victory gave the Lady Cats sole possession of first place in the league race, as Kansas upset Missouri on a last-second shot, 60-59, in Columbia, Mo. K-State is 17-7 overall and 9-2 in Big Eight play. The Tigers fell a game back at 17-7 and 8-3. "I think we survived tonight," Lady Cat interim coach Gaye Griffin said. "They were fouling us down the stretch, and we did a good job of holding our composure."

There were moments, however, when the home crowd became restless. The Sooners' aggressive full-court pressure forced 26 turnovers, including two in the final minute that put OU in a position to tie.

Trailing 91-84, Oklahoma got a break when Lady Cat point guard Mary Jo Miller was called for traveling. Sooner center Marla Duncan hit a 15-footer with 37 seconds remaining to cut the lead to 91-86.

OU's press forced another turnover, and Sooner guard Laura Rushing hit a shot in the lane as K-State's Kristie Bahner fouled. Rushing failed to convert the three-point play, but Duncan pulled down the rebound. The Sooners failed to score on three attempts in the lane, and Lady Cat senior Rita Matteucci was fouled on the rebound.

Matteucci, who finished with 14 points, made the front end of a one-and-one to seal the win.

"We weren't doing a very good job of blocking out, and we were careless for a few minutes with the basketball," Griffin said. "That's a tribute to Oklahoma. No matter how far they're down, they never give up."

The Sooners stayed close in the first half behind the play of senior Tammy Rogers. Rogers, a 5-foot-9 forward, scored 20 of her game-high 24 points on 8-of-10 shooting.

But K-State guard Nadira Hazim, who was one of three Lady Cats assigned to cover Rogers, was scoring as well. Hazim scored 13 first-half points, including 11 in the final six minutes.

Hazim finished with 24 points, one short of her career high set two years ago against Pan American. Diana Miller and Bahner added 20 apiece, and Mary Jo Miller netted 12.

The two teams traded leads six times during the first half. Oklahoma moved ahead 16-14 on a basket by Cathy Bassett with 12:16 remaining. K-State regained the lead on the following possession on a three-pointer by Diana Miller. All of Miller's 12 first-half points came from three-point range.

The Lady Cats took the lead for good at 31-30 on a three-point play by Bahner with 6:54 remaining. Hazim followed with six straight points to spark a 17-10 run. K-State led 48-40 at halftime.

K-State made another run early in the second half that appeared to put the game out of reach. The Lady Cats outscored Oklahoma 14-5 during a three-minute stretch and led 71-55 with 12:27 remaining on a pair of free throws by Hazim.

The Sooners stormed back with nine straight points, using the press to ignite the rally. Hazim ended the run with a 15-footer at the 9:07 mark.

"In the last two ball games, we haven't shot the ball well, but it wasn't because they weren't good shots," Griffin said. "We got a little bit more mentally tough tonight and put the shots in."

Netters journey to Utah

Staff and Wire Reports

The K-State tennis team heads west today, as the Wildcats open a series of dual matches against UNLV, Brigham Young and Utah.

The lady netters enter the trip at 2-0, with victories over Creighton and Southwest Missouri State two weeks ago in Manhattan.

Although the going will be tough, head coach Steve Bie-tau is looking forward to this weekend's matches.

"I think it will be one of the most challenging weekends we've ever undertaken," Bie-tau said. "Playing on their home court, with the quality of teams and players, will present some very interesting challenges."

UNLV will be K-State's first opponent, as the two square off at 1:30 p.m. today in Provo, Utah.

Friday's match will also be played in Provo, as the Wildcats face nationally ranked Brigham Young at 1:30 p.m. BYU is ranked 14th in the nation according to the Volvo Tennis Collegiate Rankings. They are led by All-American Mary Beth Young.

Saturday concludes the road trip, when the Wildcats meet Utah at 1:30 p.m. in Salt Lake City.

K-State has been led by seniors Marijke Nel and Valerie Rive, who have perfect 2-0 records as the No. 1 and No. 2 singles players. They have also combined as the No. 1 doubles team and are 1-1.

Several other Wildcats enter the weekend undefeated in singles competition. Senior Sara Hancock is 2-0, freshman Suzanne Sim is 2-0, junior Thresa Burcham is 1-0, and sophomore Tracy Parker is also 1-0.

Another doubles team is also faring well, as Hancock and Burcham are 2-0.

'Cats fall to Sooners, 85-69

By Chris Hays

Sports Editor

NORMAN, Okla. — This time there was no spitting, and there was no flagrant elbowing.

K-State and No. 11 Oklahoma battled it out in a clean, hard-fought contest at Lloyd Noble Center Wednesday night, and the Sooners broke away in the end to avenge an earlier defeat at the hands of the Wildcats, 85-69.

K-State coach Lon Kruger talked prior to the contest on how important it was for the 'Cats to be able to work successfully against the Sooners' full-court pressure.

K-State did that at times, but during the times it didn't, the Wildcats' miscues cost them dearly — as dearly as a season-high 25 turnovers.

"Their press is good, there's no question about that," Kruger said. "Generally, Oklahoma dictated with their pressure, and that's something you've got to try to avoid, especially against a top-10 club."

"We had a lot of turnovers; way too many to come in here and have a chance."

But there were times when K-State showed flashes of brilliance.

In the latter part of the first half, the 'Cats got down by 17, 37-20, and the usually-calm

Oklahoma crowd started to get fired up.

But, after a K-State timeout, the 'Cats were able to come out and eventually quiet the crowd with a 16-7 run that got them back into the contest, trailing just 44-36 at the half.

"We fought back at that point," Kruger said of the Wildcats' effort to end the first half. "We were able to make it a game at the half."

"I thought the last nine or 10 minutes of the first half were awfully good, and the first nine or 10 of the second half were awfully good, but you've got to do more than that against Oklahoma."

Those 20 minutes for the 'Cats kept them close, but the other 20 minutes pretty much told the story for Oklahoma. The Sooners had too much fire power on this night.

With the 'Cats trailing just 49-45 early in the second half, OU's Tony Martin caught fire. After he missed badly on two free throw attempts, the 6-foot-9 center couldn't seem to miss. In a span of nearly eight minutes, Martin had 11 points and Oklahoma had pulled out in front, 63-52 with 6:09 remaining.

But K-State was still determined, and after a Steve Henson bucket, the 'Cats had pulled back to within 68-60. But that's when Martin left the game to a huge ovation, and Jackie Jones entered to put on the finishing touches.

Jones netted eight-straight points during a Sooner run that finally saw Oklahoma put the lid on the victory.

The Sooners, who moved to 18-3 and 6-2, had five players in double figures. Skeeter Henry and Smokey McCovery led the way with 16 each, while Damon Patterson had 14, Jones 13 and Martin 11.

Henson led the 'Cats, now 14-11 and 4-5, with 21 points, while both Jean Derouillere and Askia Jones tallied 15. K-State continues its rugged two-game road trip with a matchup with Iowa State in Ames Saturday at 1:10 p.m.

Snyder fills recruiting class on opening day

By Scott Paske
Sports Reporter

They come from California, Pennsylvania, Illinois and Texas. They're from Missouri, Utah, Ohio, Nebraska and Kansas, too.

They're the K-State football recruiting class of 1990. And Wildcat coach Bill Snyder is happy to have them aboard.

"The best way to address how you would rate your recruiting season is to look at whether or not you've fulfilled your needs," Snyder said. "And, in looking at the young men we've signed, I'd say we've done that."

NCAA schools are allowed to sign 25 players during the signing period, which continues through Wednesday. Snyder inked all of his signees on the first day.

Included in the group are 10 linemen, six running backs, four defensive backs and a kicker. Snyder said the group included several versatile players.

"One of our criteria was to enhance our speed and athletic ability," Snyder said. "I feel we have signed at least 12 guys who have the capabilities to help us at more than one or two positions."

The 'Cats may have struck paydirt with the linemen signings. The group, which includes a pair of junior college players, averages about 260 pounds. Casey Blim, a 6-foot-3, 275-pound transfer from American River (Calif.) Junior College, and Doug Grush, a 6-3, 275-pound teammate of Blim's, are already attending classes at K-State.

Snyder awarded one of the available scholarships to Evan Simpson, a transfer who sat out last season after following the 'Cat head coach from the University of Iowa. K-State coaches say Simpson, a 5-11, 315-pound noseguard, can bench press over 550 pounds.

"We put a high priority on linemen, which I think we always will," Snyder said. "I thought it was important that we go after bigger, stronger guys."

"Don't get me wrong, we've got some talented guys here, too. But we need to be a little more powerful up front to compete in the Big Eight."

The 'Cats were able to sign seven players from Kansas, including four from Manhattan High School, which finished second in the Class 6A finals last season. Roy Stone, Laird Veatch, Jeff Placek and Kelly Greene all held true on verbal commitments.

Other in-state players include Chuck Culver, 5-10, 175, who was recruited at both defensive back and running back. Culver turned in impressive numbers on both sides of the ball at Perry-Lecompton High School, rushing for 846 yards and recording 137 tackles.

Snyder signed two players from the western part of the state. Dodge City's Keith Galindo, 6-2, 185, inked as a defensive back. Galindo was an all-state selection in 1989, quarterbacking the Red Demons to three league and regional playoff championships. He was chosen to play in the Kansas Shrine Bowl this summer.

K-State also signed Hanston's Oliver Salmans, 6-2, 210, who led his team to an 8-man state title last season. Salmans left the prep ranks as Kansas' all-time leading rusher and scorer, netting 5,307 yards during his career. He was named the Kansas offensive player of the year for all classes, and has also scored over 2,000 points in his high school basketball career.

"We're always going to put a high priority on Kansas kids," Snyder said. "This year, I believe there were anywhere from 16 to 18 legitimate Division I-A players, which I think is very good for a state this size."

"I think it's about what I expected from when I first came here and took a look at what there was to offer."

Fulbright panel picks 2 students

By Julie Wakeman
Collegian Reporter

The national screening committee for the Fulbright Scholarship has recommended two University students receive the Fulbright Scholarship next academic year.

Jennifer Bell, senior in political science and German, and Christopher Kippes, senior in philosophy, have been nominated for the scholarship, which is equivalent to more than $15,000.

The scholarship consists of transportation, tuition and a monthly stipend for one academic year in any of 55 countries, said Walter Kolonosky, director of the office of study abroad.

Kolonosky said the University averages about two recipients a year on the student level. He said there is also a graduate and faculty level of the scholarship.

"Right now Kansas is 18th in the nation in Fulbright scholarships awarded," he said. "All of the regents schools are doing very well. It's too bad more students don't apply for this."

He said there were six applicants from the University this year. There are 500 scholarships awarded nationwide every year.

The final selection will be made by the Institute of International Education later this spring, Kolonosky said.

Kippes said, if he is selected, he will study in the United Kingdom.

Bell said, if she is selected, she wants to study in West Germany because this is an exciting time in that country. She said she will be able to do some independent research on political science there.

Kolonosky said the students will know if they won the scholarship by late April or early May.

An applicant for the Fulbright Scholarship is never interviewed by any committee. Kolonosky said the screening committee looks for a winning profile in the students' applications. He also said that grades and recommendations are important.

The aspect of the application that is most important is the project description, Kolonosky said.

"This part is very critical," he said. "It separates the winners from the losers in this scholarship."

He said it's important to relate the area of study a student is in to the country he or she chooses. The project description explains why it would be necessary to study there.

Kolonosky said once the national screening committee recommends someone it usually means that person will win the scholarship.

Kippes said he doesn't know the likelihood of winning, especially since he applied to go to the United Kingdom.

He said there are a certain number of scholarships that can be awarded to each participating country, and the scholarships to study in English speaking countries are harder to win because there are more applicants.

Kolonosky said the funds for the scholarships are given by each participating university and are matched by the government of each country.

Bell said she applied for Free University in Berlin because it is the best school in Germany to study political science.

Cuts

"Wherever the cuts are going to be made, there is going to be an adverse relationship."

"We hope that we are going to be backed up by the Margin of Excellence. So far we have progressed well and now we have to take a few steps back. This will affect everything."

The recommended reductions at Emporia State were $145,000, said Harry Stephens, vice president for student affairs and legislative liaison.

"We were able to manage this year without reducing classes, but the reduction will have an impact on equipment and services," he said. "Next year's reduction of $182,000 will have an impact on teaching assistant positions as well as sections not offered."

"We will not make the decision of offering classes and then cancelling them. Rather we will make the decision of limiting classes initially."

Stephens said the reductions will affect the quality of higher education in Kansas.

"When you have crowded classrooms and unhappy students, this has an impact on the university's environment. Faculty members who lack the appropriate equipment to do research are also unhappy," he said. "If there are 30 students in the class, the quality of teaching is different from teaching 40 students."

"The Legislature should seriously look at Governor Hayden's recommendation and attempt to restore a number of items in base budget reductions. It is important to restore the importance of the regents schools."

The Kansas College of Technology had reductions because of the shrinkage for the first time. The recommended amount was $58,928, said Mike Renk, controller.

"We only have 96 full-time employees. If people resign, we have to leave the positions uncovered," he said. "When we have any type of budget cuts, it cuts down on our services. Certain jobs won't be filled and everyone will be affected."

Renk said KCT needs all the money in its budget.

"If somebody resigns we have to advertise to fill that position. This money is not figured into our budget. Even two vacant positions will affect us and a cut will have to be made in services," he said.

Schools outside the regents system are also affected by the governor's recommendations, even though increase in shrinkage does not affect them.

"Johnson County Community College derives 55 percent from local property tax. One of the governor's (proposals) is a tax lid this would significantly affect our revenues," said Robert Burdick, director of college information and publications at Johnson County Community College.

The college has a limit set by the Board of Education on its amount of tuition, and that limit has been reached at this time, so they are unable to increase their revenues, Burdick said.

"But the budget cut proposal does not really contain a cut for community college aid. Instead there was a slight increase in the state aid in the pupil/credit hour basis," he said.

Johnson County Community College has had an enrollment growth of 50 percent in the past five years, and a tax lid would reduce the services that make the college unique, Burdick said.

unique and especially difficult.

"We have to deal with what I call 'double-double jeopardy,'" Smith said. "We weren't helped enough by the civil rights movement, and we weren't helped enough by the women's movement. We're going to have to take a stand because we have yet to be recognized in the world."

Smith said that in the fights for civil rights and women's rights, determination and unity are key.

"By not showing that we care, we are actually supporting our own oppression," she said.

Smith said she is thankful for her opportunity to speak to grade school children on Martin Luther King Jr. Day. She believes it is important for people to learn about racial understanding at a young age because so many ideals are formed early in life.

"Kids just like me, maybe because I look like one of them," Smith said with a laugh. "They're so natural and honest and so full of positive energy. If we could just keep those qualities as we grow up, our world would be a much better place."

Senate postpones top nominations

By Kirk Caraway
Collegian Reporter

In a surprising move, Student Senate postponed indefinitely the appointments made by Student Body President Todd Johnson of five students to Tribunal Thursday night.

Although in past years the appointments have almost routinely been approved, Senate debated for more than an hour before postponing that part of the resolution.

Opposition to the appointments arose when it was learned two previous members of Tribunal were not reappointed in favor of two, less-experienced selections. Also questioned was the selection of Johnny Gaffney, who serves on Johnson's cabinet and worked for his election campaign.

"I think the student body president used poor judgement in the selection process," said Arts and Sciences Senator Travis Stumpff.

Stumpff raised several objections to the appointments and moved that they be postponed indefinitely, which essentially kills the resolution.

Bill Nelson and Teresa Pennington served on the last Tribunal, but their reappointments were rejected in favor of two candidates with no judicial experience.

"Previous experience is important, but it's not the only criteria," said Rob Dieringer, SGA attorney general and former chancellor of Tribunal. Dieringer said Nelson and Pennington were excellent Tribunal members, but that he didn't suggest their reappointment to Johnson because of group dynamics.

"We need to be sure the group works together well," Dieringer said.

"We wanted the most unbiased group possible," said Fred Wingert, Johnson's chief of staff. "We came up with the very best five."

Stumpff questioned Johnson's motives for his selections because of an alleged dispute between Johnson and the old Tribunal.

Cuts hit administration

Each area allowed to determine amount of recisions

By Steve Franzen
Staff Reporter

The of Department Intercollegiate Athletics and the academic departments are not the only ones feeling the crunch of budget cutbacks — the University's central administration has also been affected.

"The bottom line is that we probably contributed more than our fair share," said Tom Schellhardt, acting vice president for administration and finance.

Letters concerning cutbacks and specific shares were sent to each area on Jan. 31. Each area was allowed to determine where specific cuts would be made. The lists of cuts were due back in the Budget Office Wednesday. John Struve, budget director, said the areas concerned were also asked to provide additional information and analysis. The reports are still being received and analyzed.

"The administration was asked to cut on an equal basis," Struve said.

The cuts were calculated from salary shrinkage and savings from vacant positions. Struve said that the process of shrinkage has applied to K-State for many years.

The University's shrinkage rate is currently about 2.7 percent. This is averaged from a 2 percent rate for classified employees and 5 percent for unclassified employees.

Struve said Gov. Mike Hayden recommended raising the percentage rate figure up to 3.2 percent for fiscal year 1990. The recommendation figure, made on Jan. 8, is generated from last year's vacancy savings.

Overall, this meant a cut of $1.275 million from the 1989-90 University budget due to shrinkage. This number was derived from two sources. Vacancies created a savings of $620,000 and a straight pro-rating based upon salaries created another $655,000, Struve said.

Through these calculations, the Budget Office was able to offer departments two items in the cutback process, he said. The office provided a target cutback number and offered cutback suggestions to each department.

One area affected by the cutbacks was Institutional Advancement.

"We have frozen several hirings and reclassifications," said Pat Bosco, associate vice president and dean of student life. "This has had a direct impact on our morale."

Bosco said that cutbacks will not affect recruiting trips, but the department has considered eliminating some recruitment publications and limiting others. Bosco does not anticipate having to fire any employees. The cutbacks have delayed the replacement of one admission representative, but Bosco said he hopes to fill that position in the next fiscal year.

The Office of Administration and Finance is another area where cutbacks have occurred.

Administration and finance cut $138,000 from its budget. A major portion of this sum will come from the $50,000 cutback handed to facilities. This sharply contrasts the $3,500 cutback asked of personnel, Schellhardt said.

"We will probably have to cut back on student-employee hours and overtime," he said.

The Office of the President has not been excluded from cutbacks. The office has been asked to cut $6,000 from its budget.

Charles Reagan, executive assistant to the president, said the money will be taken from the office's other operating expenses fund. The office has no vacancies.

House vote kills death penalty bill

Legislators approve measure requiring mandatory sentence

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The push for capital punishment apparently died in the House Thursday, where members rejected a death penalty proposal in favor of a plan to create a hard life sentence for some murders.

The House tentatively approved a bill that would allow judges to sentence persons convicted of premeditated murder to 40 years in prison with no chance of parole. Representatives are scheduled to take a final vote on the bill Friday, and passage would send the measure to Gov. Mike Hayden.

The House approved the 40-year bill after members rejected, 67-57, an amendment that would have made death by lethal injection the possible penalty for some murders. The debate took nearly four hours.

The amendment failed because eight representatives who have supported capital punishment in the past voted against it. Most of them cited Senate opposition to the death penalty and said they wanted the 40-year bill to pass because it was the toughest penalty the Legislature will approve.

Speaker Jim Braden, R-Clay Center, said he does not plan to attempt to bring another death penalty measure to the House floor for debate.

"I told the governor six weeks ago that I doubted whether there would be enough votes in the House to have it passed," Braden said. "It was a true up or down vote on the death penalty."

In a statement, Hayden criticized lawmakers as out of touch with the majority of Kansans, whom polls have shown support the death penalty. He did not say whether he would sign the 40-year bill.

"He's going to study it," said Hayden's deputy press secretary, Frank Ybarra.

Hayden made reinstatement of the death penalty a visible issue during his 1986 campaign, and he has announced that he will seek a second term this year.

"Frankly, I am not surprised at anything the Legislature would do at this point," Hayden said. "Despite the actions of the Legislature, I remain a strong supporter of capital punishment."

The House last voted on the death penalty bill in 1987, passing it, 71-53. That year the Senate rejected it, 22-18. The Senate also rejected a death penalty bill by the same vote last year. Hayden vowed to push again this session for reinstatement of capital punishment.

Twenty-three members of the House were not elected until after the 1987 vote, and 17 of those representatives voted against the capital punishment amendment.

Only six Democrats supported the amendment, while 50 Democrats voted against them. Fifty-one of the House's 68 Republican members supported the amendment.

The past death penalty supporters who switched votes were: George Dean, D-Wichita; Herman Dillon, D-Kansas City; Clyde Graeber, R-Leavenworth; Lee Hamm, D-Pratt; Mary Jane Johnson, D-Kansas City; Jack Lacey, D-Oswego; Dennis Spaniol, R-Wichita, and Larry Turnquist, D-Salina.

Graeber is a strong supporter of the death penalty, and he has sponsored legislation in the past. He said that if he couldn't get the death penalty, he at least wanted to send to Hayden a 40-year bill.

"We have an opportunity today that we might not have after today," Graeber told his colleagues. "This is not easy for me because I really am emotionally involved in this, and I believe the death penalty can be a deterrent."

Hamm said: "I'm tired of the game-playing."

However, Braden said he didn't buy the argument presented by Graeber and the others.

"It's apparent to me that those people are not going to vote for a death penalty," Braden said.

The 40-year sentence bill was introduced by a group of senators, led by Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, and passed overwhelmingly by the Senate last year. Bond is opposed to the death penalty and championed the proposal as a tough alternative.

Gov. Mike Hayden addresses a group of high school students and advisers participating in the Project Graduation conference Thursday in the K-State Union Ballroom. Hayden praised efforts of high school students working toward his proposed "Drug-free Kansas."

Anti-drug budget will increase

By Joann Beckman
Collegian Reporter

Gov. Mike Hayden announced Thursday that the amount of money spent in Kansas' Drug Free Schools Program will double next year.

The governor gave closing remarks at the Project Graduation conference Thursday in the K-State Union Ballroom.

The conference was aimed at helping high school students plan and implement prom and graduation activities that are alcohol and drug free, said Elizabeth Day, senior in history and coordinator of the conference.

Hayden said Kansas has received a significant increase in the amount of federal dollars available for drug education.

"We will be able to increase our expenditures from $4 per pupil, which is the current level for drug education statewide, to $8 per pupil for next year," he said.

"More than 90 percent of this money will go directly to local school districts, right to your schools," Hayden said.

But some high school students attending the speech said they believe the money currently being spent is not reaching them.

Jim Weishapl, a high school student from Goodland, said he sees little money currently being used for alcohol or drug abuse programs in his school.

"We had a Students Against Drunk Driving chapter last year, but I guess the attendance dropped this year for some reason," he said. "I don't know if we have it any more."

Jennifer Peters, a high school student from Inman, said her school does not have any kind of alcohol or drug abuse programs.

The Drug Free Schools Program is part of the Toward a Drug Free Kansas Program, which Hayden implemented soon after taking office in 1987.

Hayden said 95 percent of Kansas school districts participate in the Toward a Drug-Free Kansas Program.

"Government officials, police officers, judges and other citizens throughout our state are all saying that we cannot, and we will not, tolerate drunk driving in Kansas," Hayden said.

The government alone cannot win

Regents approve Hill's Center

From Staff and Wire Reports

TOPEKA — The Kansas Board of Regents approved Thursday preliminary plans for the Hill's National Center for Veterinary Practice Management, a $1.7 million project at K-State.

At a news conference, executives of Hill's Pet Products, headquartered in Topeka, announced a $1.7 million grant to finance the project, the first of its kind in the nation.

The center will train veterinarians in business so they can operate their own offices. The new center will be located in Trotter Hall at the Veterinary Medicine Complex and occupy 5,300 square feet of currently unfinished space. Improvements that will be made to the existing space include a 100-seat specialized auditorium.

"The specialized auditorium can use different formats and kinds of teaching because the seating can be rearranged," said Michael Lorenz, dean of Veterinary Medicine.

Other improvements include a meeting room with state-of-the-art audio visual capabilities, and a computer room with 35 work stations and related technical support areas. The project will cost a total of $480,000. This includes asbestos abatement, audio/visual and computer equipment.

Lorenz has been working with Hill's Pet Products Inc. for 18 months to get the center here.

"It will be a great opportunity to improve the quality of veterinary management, and help provide quality continuing education for alumni," Lorenz said.

It is an area that has not been emphasized until the present time, Lorenz said. When students graduate from vet school they know about animal surgery, but not how to run a practice. Lorenz said there was a real void in the area of veterinary management practice.

It seemed natural to fill the void in the learning of strong vet management practice, said Dave Geier, vice president of marketing at Hill's. Hill's has worked to develop a model curriculum with help from faculty at other universities.

He said the center will establish a physical center where new techniques, concepts and ideas can be developed and tried.

K-State was chosen because Hill's was founded in Kansas and has been in Topeka for more than 80 years, Geier said. The University is in the center of the country, and the company has a good working relationship with the college, he said.

"The dean is very progressive and receptive to new ideas and ways to educate students," Geier said.

"The center will bring a lot of resources to K-State that it doesn't currently have," Lorenz said.

"I think it is an excellent example of how the private and public sector can work together to meet the needs of the school," Provost James Coffman said.

He said it's the only center of its kind and will fulfill a needed role nationwide.

"It will bring a lot of recognition that is warranted," Coffman said.

Bush sets up 'anti-drug cartel'

CARTAGENA, Colombia (AP) — President Bush and three Latin American leaders, conducting a tense summit under an air, sea and land security shield, forged agreement Thursday on a new joint drug-fighting strategy. Bush called it "the first anti-drug cartel."

Flanked by the leaders of the three largest cocaine-producing nations, Bush called the summit an "ice-breaking" event. He vowed to step up attempts to curtail the demand for narcotics at home, saying "we are making progress" but that more needs to be done.

A joint communique signed by Bush and Presidents Virgilio Barco of Colombia, Jaime Paz Zamora of Bolivia and Alan Garcia apparently ruled out the use of U.S. military forces in the Andean region. "Each country may involve its armed forces in this fight within its own national territory," it said.

In their meeting, they steered away from some of the most controversial drug initiatives, such as the idea of a naval cord-off Colombia, and chose instead to deal in broader themes. That helped keep harmony among sometimes differing leaders.

Seaman 'needed practice'

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) — The chief mate of the Exxon Valdez testified Thursday that he'd warned skipper Joseph Hazelwood that the seaman who took the helm on the ship's disastrous last voyage "needed practice in steering."

James Kunkel, corroborating earlier testimony by another officer in Hazelwood's trial, said he'd sailed with seaman Robert Kagan four years earlier and on that voyage Kagan could not perform a simple task such as painting a bulkhead without constant supervision.

He said he discussed Kagan's performance with Hazelwood before the Exxon Valdez began its trip into Prince William Sound.

"I mentioned I'd sailed with him before and I thought he needed extra supervision and extra practice in steering," Kunkel said of his conversation with Hazelwood. "His steering ability needed to be watched."

Child-sex tape found in VCR

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The discovery of a homemade child-sex tape in a stolen videocassette recorder led to the arrest of the VCR owner on charges of molesting a 9-year-old neighbor girl, authorities said Thursday.

Ward Rafay, 28, was arraigned Wednesday on nine counts of child molestation and one of possessing a kilogram of marijuana for sale, and was being held on $50,000 bail.

Two weeks ago, Rafay told police that a VCR was stolen from his apartment in Downey, 10 miles southeast of downtown Los Angeles. Deputy District Attorney Dean Shotwell said the thief sold the VCR with the telltale tape inside.

The buyer recognized the girl on the tape and arranged through another party for the tape to be turned over to the girl's mother, he said. Authorities do not know the identities of the thief or the buyer.

Rafay was arrested hours after the enraged mother contacted police.

"The mother of the victim notified us Saturday that she had a tape depicting immoral acts with her children," said Downey police Detective Capt. Bob Williams.

He refused to give other details of the case, saying, "We don't want to hamper the investigation."

Men charged in slaying

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Two men were charged Thursday with first-degree murder in connection with the slaying of the night manager at the Savoy Grill, a popular restaurant in downtown Kansas City.

Police said Jose Drew, 30, and Terence Wilson, 27, both of Kansas City, were charged with first-degree murder, robbery and two counts each of armed criminal action.

Drew and Wilson were being held Thursday night in the city jail on $300,000 bond and were scheduled to be arraigned on the charges Friday, police said.

Drew was an employee of the restaurant and had been assigned to kitchen duties, according to a police report.

The body of Scott L. Crum, 33, was found in a second-floor office Wednesday morning. He had been stabbed to death, police said, apparently after he was unable to open a safe.

Between 10 and 12 cartons of cigarettes were stolen.

Relaxant found in antibiotic

WASHINGTON (AP) — More than 3,000 bottles of an antibiotic distributed by Goldline Laboratories, doxycycline hyclate, are being recalled because one bottle was found to contain a muscle relaxant, federal officials said Thursday.

Doxycycline hyclate is used to treat a wide range of infections, including venereal diseases, acne and life-threatening pneumonia.

The Food and Drug Administration said the mislabeled muscle relaxant, carisoprodol, could harm patients because it would not treat their infections and could impair their mental and physical abilities, making it dangerous to drive a car or operate heavy machinery.

The recalled bottles of Goldline doxycycline hyclate 100 milligrams are in six lots. The bottles carry lot numbers 824039, 844059, 863069, 882079, 883079 and 919099.

Man convicted of killing wife

WICHITA (AP) — A 51-year-old Lawrence man was convicted Thursday of killing his estranged wife and attempting to kill her boyfriend.

A Sedgewick County jury deliberated a day and a half before ruling that Cain Dixon murdered his wife, Bonita Dixon, 41. The couple was getting a divorce when the shooting took place last November.

Prosecutors charged that Dixon drove from Lawrence to Wichita, where he shot his wife three times with a shotgun. They charged that he then drove to the apartment complex of the boyfriend and became involved in a shootout with the man.

Dixon was convicted of first-degree murder, attempted first-degree murder and aggravated burglary.

Judge refuses trial relocation

JUNCTION CITY (AP) — A defense request to move the murder trial of former Emporia minister Thomas Bird was turned down Thursday by a judge who also said the state can present evidence of prior crimes that sent him to prison.

Bird, 39, is scheduled for trial Feb. 26 on a first-degree murder charge in the 1983 death of Martin K. Anderson, whose wife had been Bird's lover. Anderson was shot to death in a field along a Geary County road after his wife, Lorna, stopped their van, saying she was ill.

Anderson, a mother of four who had been Bird's secretary at Faith Lutheran Church in Emporia, pleaded guilty last November to a reduced charge of second-degree murder in her husband's death.

South African pastor to talk

By Cosima Hadidi
Staff Reporter

Reverend T.S. Farisani, a South African pastor, is scheduled to deliver a Lou Douglas Lecture Sunday at 7 p.m. in the K-State Union Forum Hall.

Farisani's lecture is titled "Liberating South Africa: Confronting Apartheid." It will also be a Wayne Rohrer Memorial Lecture on peace and justice.

Farisani is a pastor, dean and bishops' deputy of the predominantly black Evangelical Lutheran Church in South Africa, said the Rev. Don Fallon, K-State coordinator of religious activities.

Farisani also serves as director of the human rights commission. He worked with Steve Biko in the Black Consciousness movement, and recently led the Ecumenical Confessing Fellowship which resists apartheid, Fallon said.

Farisani has been imprisoned and tortured on five different occasions in the past ten years because of his outspoken criticism of apartheid, he said.

"As a pastor, Farisani has a form of non-violent action in protesting the immorality and violation of human rights in South Africa," Fallon said. "He also criticized strongly the establishment of seven homelands and the removal of families into these homelands."

From 1983 to 1986, Farisani traveled in Africa, Northern Europe and the United States, telling the story of his torture and the injustice in South Africa, Fallon said.

"When he returned, he was arrested again from November 1986 until January 1987," Fallon said. "Amnesty International and the Lutheran mission visited South Africa on his behalf, and the U.S. State Department received 26,000 letters asking for his release. Because of the world response, the government had to release him."

After being imprisoned, tortured and banned from South Africa, Farisani fled to the United States for treatment at the Minneapolis Torture Center in Minnesota, Fallon said.

"Farisani suffered greatly, yet he always talks about the suffering corporately, stressing that all his people are suffering," he said. "He has a deep compassion and love stemming

Panel: Apartheid end could happen in time

By Ellen Dayton
Campus Editor

No one can predict the future of South Africa, but some hope the release of Nelson Mandela Sunday was the first sign of an end to apartheid.

"It's a beautiful country, but socially and politically it leaves much to be desired," said Jonathan Ramathoka, graduate student in agricultural education. "But hopefully, with the release of Nelson Mandela, negotiations and the freedom of everybody, it will be better."

Ramathoka, Clive Fullagar, assistant professor of psychology, and Don Fallon, K-State coordinator of religious activities, participated in a panel discussion titled "Mandela's South Africa: Revolution and Negotiations" Thursday evening in the K-State Union.

The panel served as a prelecture forum for the Wayne Rohrer Memorial Lecture and Lou Douglas Special Lecture by the Rev. T.S. Farisani. The lecture, titled "Liberating South Africa: Confronting Apartheid," is scheduled for 7 p.m. Sunday in Union Forum Hall.

Ramathoka, a citizen of South Africa, spoke about his experiences with apartheid. He said he grew up in a rural community, where blacks tend to have more problems.

"You have more problems in an area dominated by conservative Afrikaner farmers," he said. "In urban areas like Johannesburg, it's easier for blacks and whites to meet. In my area, there is no mixing."

Fullagar talked about the politics of liberation in terms of the black political parties, particularly the African National Congress.

He said the ANC, founded in 1912, is one of the oldest black resistance movements in the country. In 1955, the ANC developed its ideological platform, the Freedom Charter, on the principles of non-racism and socialism.

Farm house not just Inn

Family home serves as bed and breakfast business

It's like home.

The smells of the noon meal still linger in the kitchen of this two-story limestone farmhouse. Betty Anderson greets guests with a smile. A white and light blue porcelain wood stove sits against one wall. But, while it was once used for cooking, it now serves as a filing cabinet for her husband, Neil, professor of surgery and medicine in the College of Veterinary Medicine.

"That's the kind of stove I cooked on before I left for school, so it's not as romantic as it looks," Betty Anderson said.

The Andersons' home is the Kimble Cliff Bed and Breakfast, five miles west of Manhattan, on Anderson Avenue. Betty Anderson operates the inn as well as the Country Cupboard, an antique shop located behind the house in a limestone barn, which was built in 1893.

The house has two guest rooms on the second floor, which is at the same level as the hill into which the house is built. The Lydia Room is named after Neil Anderson's grandmother, whose portrait hangs on the wall. The room catches the midday sun as it pours through the south-facing windows. A queen-size bed sits next to a chaise longue, called a fainting couch, in the room that is furnished with antiques Anderson has acquired in her years in the antique business. A glass oil lamp sits half full of red fuel on the dresser. Fresh towels and a bathrobe hang in the closet.

"I let honeymoon couples have (the room) when they come," Betty Anderson said.

The downstairs is furnished with Betty Anderson's own antique American furnishings. The winter parlor features an oak-mantled fireplace. The mosaic tile insert around the fireplace and the hearth are cracked down the center. Betty Anderson said she was told lightning struck it, coming in through a window 15 feet away.

The doorways are all framed in pine. She said that when the house was built, pine had to be brought in and was considered more prestigious than the walnut that was used to frame and floor the limestone barn.

The dining room's oak table seats guests for a continental breakfast.

American teenagers need sex licenses

It's always been a long held theory of mine that if people remain in public office for too long a time they will eventually go insane. Something about being around all that legislation, all those egos and having to hear the gripes and grievances of every voter and special interest group in your district must do something to the mind.

A bill before the Washington state legislature may well have proven this theory.

The bill is sponsored by state Sen. Jim West, a republican from Spokane, Wash., and promises to solve the problem of teenage pregnancy by making all sex, including heavy petting, illegal for anyone under 18 years of age. West, whose actual amount of time in office I have been unable to find out, believes that if sex were illegal for teenagers, high school students would then have a good reason to just say "no" in a moment of passion.

For some reason or another, West has apparently received a great deal of criticism for this bill.

But is this criticism justified? Would such a bill work in Kansas? Let's take a closer look.

If sex were illegal for those under 18, we would be forced to develop some method of determining who was of age and who was not. After all, a 17 year old and an 18 year old look an awful lot alike.

In order to ensure that only those of legal age were having sex, everyone who was of age would be issued a Sex License. If you were caught having sex without a license, you would face the punishment proposed by the Washington bill; up to 90 days in jail and a $5,000 fine, unless you decide to marry your partner — in which case the rules no longer apply — or until you produce your license.

Of course, a Sex License would only be issued to those applicants who had passed a drug and disease test as well as written and oral examinations. You could get a learner's permit at the age of 16, but you would only be allowed to have sex in the presence of an adult.

People who live on farms could be issued sex licenses at the age of 14, but could only have sex during harvest, or while traveling to and from school.

Special "heavy-petting-only" licenses would also be issued, but only under extraordinary circumstances.

The Sex License also offers an interesting way to boost enrollment and retention in Kansas universities and other bastions of post-secondary education across the nation.

Dwayne Lively

COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

Because most of the potential applicants would already be in college by the time they were 18, a university education could become a new requirement for a Sex License. In much the same way that the driver's licenses of high school drop outs are being revoked in some states, so too could Sex Licenses be revoked if the licensee either drops out or flunks out of college. The person would no longer be able to legally have sex until the age of 25.

This bill would be especially effective in keeping males in college. Because males supposedly reach their sexual peak around age 18, they surely wouldn't want to lose their sex privileges and miss their prime.

Women would have a new excuse for brushing off someone they were not interested in; they could claim they didn't have a Sex License, or say they did but refuse to show it (having sex with an unlicensed partner would also be a crime so sex with a person refusing to show their license would be a dangerous gamble.) The women could emphasize how they "would never want to break the law, nerd."

However, no law is perfect, and there is at least one loophole in the Sex Bill. The police will have to be on a careful look out for people 18 years of age and older providing sex for their underage friends. Such an act, which constitutes contributing to the delinquency of a minor, would be punishable by time in jail, a fine, and the revocation of the perpetrator's Sex License for three years.

Another flaw with the sex bill, according to West, is that it would be a difficult law to enforce.

I ask you, though; since when does the enforceability of a law have any bearing on whether the law passes or not? It's neither our job as citizens, nor the legislators', to worry about law enforcement; that's the job of the police. This law would, in fact, be a favor to the police. After all, they're so busy chasing down drug dealers, drug smugglers, murderers, rapists, vandals, burglars and other criminals, that spending some of their time chasing down and keeping a careful watch over the morals and sex lives of thousands of teenagers in the midst of the worst hormonal explosion of their lives ought to be a welcome change of pace.

This is even more significant when we remember the police do such a great job at keeping alcohol out of the hands of those under 21 years of age, we should have no qualms about their ability to enforce a law which prohibits an instinctive physical act?

In the end, I think this Sex Bill and the Sex License have a lot to offer the average citizen, especially the age group it was designed to protect. Now teenagers will be able to ignore the hormonal explosion occurring in their bodies, and their own natural curiosity, and focus on their studies.

Or they could always get married at an age when young people who try to marry are usually told they're too young to get married. This sudden increase in teenage weddings would also end the problem of unwed teenage mothers. And that's what's really important, isn't it?

Landlords and officials can reach agreement

The proposed Rental Inspection Program in Manhattan represents a step forward in improving the living and academic environments for student tenants.

The opposition being shown by landlords to the program is based purely on economics. The notion that the landlords are concerned with discouraging students from attending K-State because of increases in rental rates is ludicrous.

The argument that mandatory safety measures would raise rents is shaky at best. One- and two-year-old apartments can be rented at comparable rates while complying to safety standards.

These landlords are worried about profit margins, not about students.

Members of the Manhattan City Commission have consistently supported safety measures that would "get students out of basements." This is a responsible effort on the part of the commissioners to deal with an increasing student population.

Landlords have been spoiled in Manhattan. Many have rented the same space for years with little or no improvements being made for safety, let alone general maintenance. It is time to establish a uniform code to bring existing rentals up to standards and to direct building contractors in the future.

This type of inspection program will do exactly that.

The argument that no safety cost matches the price of a lost life is quickly becoming a cliché, but it is still a valid defense of this program.

The controversy between the landlords and the city officials supporting the program invites compromise. If landlords would make the effort to improve the overall quality of rented student housing, it would not only provide a safer living environment for students, but would justify inevitable rent increases.

Sakharov a great man

The recent stunning decision of the Soviet Central Committee to relinquish the Communist Party's constitutionally guaranteed role as "the leading and guiding force of Soviet Society and the nucleus of its political system" will have profound reverberations through the end of the century. The Congress of People's Deputies is expected to endorse the decision at its next meeting, during the summer. The monolithic system that gave up any pretense of sharing power in 1918 is now acknowledging that a pluralistic society offers the best hope for "restructuring" Soviet society, perhaps the only hope.

What is extraordinary is how quickly people have forgotten the man who is most responsible for the momentous changes now occurring in the Soviet Union — Andrei Dmitrievich Sakharov. It is dismaying to remember how much this great man suffered for the principles now being enthusiastically endorsed by the same party hacks who made his life hell for years. While Gorbachev should be given full marks for his political courage and awareness, it was Sakharov who provided the vision. With Sakharov's death Dec. 14, the Soviet Union lost the one man who might have been able to bind his nation's wounds.

Sakharov paid dearly for his outspoken criticism of the Soviet system. Following Sakharov's criticism of the December 1979 Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, Brezhnev had had enough, and Sakharov and his wife were exiled to Gorki, where they were under the constant harassment of the KGB's thugs. Sakharov resorted to hunger strikes to persuade Soviet authorities to grant his wife traveling privileges to the United States for medical treatment. Certainly, the blood of Academician Sakharov is on the hands of the

John C.K. Daly

GUEST COLUMNIST

Committee for State Security's warders. Sakharov's courage never faltered; after Gorbachev released him from internal exile in December 1986, Sakharov handed him a list of several hundred political prisoners at their first meeting. Despite his health being weakened by his exile, Sakharov continued to speak for those without a voice — Jewish refuseniks, Crimean Tatars, Baptists, Uniate Christians, Sakharov voiced their concerns at every opportunity. Elected last year as a delegate to the Congress of People's Deputies, Sakharov used his national prominence to champion such unfashionable issues as human rights and reform. Such quiet boldness clearly rankled Gorbachev; during one exchange he cut off Sakharov's microphone.

On the last day of his life, Sakharov attempted to open a dialogue in the Congress of People's Deputies on the very article of the Soviet Constitution which the Central Committee has dismissed. The final image remains for Soviet citizens of Gorbachev's attempts to silence Sakharov on the last day of his life, the General Secretary making angry cutting motions with his arms when Sakharov attempted to press the issue. Despite the General Secretary's displeasure, Sakharov was determined; according to his wife, his last words were "tomorrow there will be a great battle." Instead, a heart attack was Sakharov's last battle.

What few people in the West know is that, in the last weeks of his life, Sakharov drew up a 46 article constitution whose purpose was to transform the Soviet Union into a voluntary union of sovereign republics whose representatives would be chosen by free elections with secret ballots, a union which would respect the rights of all individuals "regardless of race, nationality, sex, age or social position." The envisaged state would feature a mixed economy, private property, a multi-party system, and strict guarantees for human rights. Echoing American values, Sakharov's fifth article guaranteed that "all people have the right to life, liberty and happiness." Unlike our own society which condones both Donald Trump and people in our cities living in cardboard boxes on steam grates in the winter, Sakharov's document declares that "no one shall live in destitution." Such a compassionate, thoughtful document is less likely to be implemented now that its creator is gone, a true tragedy for the U.S.S.R.

Perhaps the final word on this great man belongs to one inspired by him, Vitaly Koroitch, editor of the journal Ogonyok. "The totalitarian system probably killed him in the end, I'm only glad that before he died Sakharov dealt the system a mortal blow." What a pity that George Bush, who could find the time to attend the war criminal Hirohito's funeral, was incapable of attending the funeral of the man most responsible for a "kinder, gentler U.S.S.R." History will most certainly treat this extraordinary man with the reverence and honor denied him by his contemporaries.

John C.K. Daly is an assistant professor of history.

A Georgian Home in Abilene

What do you call an 85-year-old Southern-style mansion whose 25 rooms, one-lane bowling alley, and Edison hand-blown light bulbs have remained virtually unchanged since it was built?

If you are Helen Seelye or Terry Tietjens, you call it home.

Tietjens and his twin brother Jerry bought the house from Helen Seelye and her sister Marion in February 1982. It was built by Dr. A.B. Seelye, patent medicine entrepreneur, and his wife in 1905 at a cost of $55,000.

The sisters had lived there for years and previously showed no interest in selling their home to any of the prospective buyers who appeared on the doorstep from time to time.

But the home was badly damaged by a fire in January 1982. By that time, the mansion had become a darkened hulk in need of repainting and a new roof. It was then the Seelye sisters took seriously the offer of a man who had first seen the house in 1969.

"When I saw it I was on tour with a men's choral group from Emporia State," Tietjens said. "I thought to myself, 'That's a beautiful house and I'd like to buy it and live in it.'"

Although Tietjens' desires would wait for him to finish college and go on to be a music teacher, he gradually developed a friendship with the ladies who owned the house. By 1982, the years of gentle persuasion paid off. The Tietjens brothers were able to buy the house.

But ownership of the massive white mansion, occupying a half a block of Highway 15 through Abilene, is not all that came with the deal.

"When we bought the house, I adopted two grandmothers," Tietjens says with a smile, his eyes twinkling.

Since that time, both Jerry Tietjens and Marion Seelye have died. And though Terry Tietjens lives there, Helen Seelye still calls the mansion home, a condition which was part of the sales agreement.

Seelye isn't particularly enthused to see the curious who now tour her home for $5. It shows in her face perhaps more than in what she says.

"I guess they think I'm sort of an antique, too," she said with a resigned grin.

A.B. Seelye's medicine business had been successful enough by 1905 to tear down the Victorian house which occupied the site and build the more modern Georgian style mansion. It was designed by a New York architect, whose plans were subjected to the scrutiny of A.B. Seelye's wife.

"Mrs. Seelye told the architect that there were to be 18 closets," Tietjens explained as he opened the door to one such closet, with its own concave lead glass window for airing clothes. "When the plans came back, there were only 16. The plans were then sent back, and the house has 18 closets."

The Seelyes could afford to be picky. A.B. Seelye had become well-established as a purveyor of medicines and cure-alls, which he had begun making in his mother's kitchen years earlier. Later, Helen Seelye would serve as head chemist for the company, a title she held for 40 years. The company made its patent medicines until 1957, Tietjens said. One such product was Wasa-Tusa.

"You could give it to your cow, your calf, your horse, your wife," Tietjens said. "It said so right on the bottle."

When the Seelye sisters went with their parents to the St. Louis World's Fair in 1904, there were over 100 such Seelye products being sold in 14 states. It was at that fair they first saw Edison's electric lights and the one-lane duck-pin bowling alley which would be incorporated into the new house.

Many other extravagancies were included in the home. Tietjens explained as he sat at and played the Steinway and Sons mahogany grand piano in the music room. This was a specially selected piano shipped from New York for A.B. Seelye.

In the corner of the room sits one of Edison's cylinder phonographs, the sound from its original diamond needle still clear. The fire place in the entryway, with patterns of green fern leaves, was designed by Tiffany and made from mosaic tiles produced near Venice. A brass turtle sits in front of the fireplace, whose back opens to reveal matches when the head is pressed down.

"It's a ladies' cuspidor — a ladies' spittoon," Tietjens explained. "But the Seelyes allowed no chewing tobacco, no cigarettes, no alcohol in the home. So they used it to hold matches, and it has sat there since the house was built."

The mansion was equipped with telephones and 220-volt electrical lines when it was built, which were run underground.

"There's never been a line showing to the house," Tietjens said.

The first meal in the home was Christmas 1905, the 50th wedding anniversary of A.B. Seelye's parents. The family sat around the heavy oak table which still dominates the center of the oak-paneled dining room.

"We keep one leaf in it still," Tietjens said. "But there are 14 leaves for it, so that it can seat 24."

On the third floor is the oak-floored ballroom, which originally had no furniture except for a few chairs at one end for musicians. An Edison wind-up record player now sits in the center of the room in the event that one wants to dance to tunes of its time. To the sides of the room are six of the 11 bedrooms, three of which were used by servants. Another two servants were brought in during the day.

"The smallest room in the house was the head servant's room," Tietjens said, opening the door to the 10 by 12 foot room. "But even it had separate radiator heat."

Just outside the door is a hallway leading to a staircase and a recently added bathroom. The bathroom originally housed an elevator. It was the elevator's faulty wiring that caused the fire that damaged the back of the house.

But that damage is undetectable now, thanks to the work of the Tietjens and the willingness of the Seelyes to open their home. Tietjens and Helen Seelye seem quite pleased with "our home," as Tietjens refers to it again and again.

"She's quite a young lady," he says, referring to Helen Seelye, who will be 94 this month. "She does real well for someone who's 39 and holding. Is it 29 or 39?" he asks her.

"Oh, somewhere in between," Helen Seelye says with a smile.

Helen Seelye, who will be 94 later this month, has lived in the Seelye mansion since it was constructed in 1905 by her father.

The Seelye Mansion, a 25-room, Georgian-style home in Abilene, was built in 1905 by A.B. Seelye, owner of a patent medicine company, at a cost of $55,000.

In addition to a one lane bowling alley, the house was equipped with electric lights. Both were first seen by the Seelye's at the 1904 St. Louis World's Fair.

Wildcats eye important road victory

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

The Wildcats' season is heading into the backstretch and the K-State players look as if they might be putting everything together at the right time.

K-State was impressive in its 65-58 victory over then-No. 1-ranked Missouri, and then the 'Cats buried Colorado, 93-65, before losing to Oklahoma on the road Wednesday night in Norman, where they were still able to do some things well, Coach Lon Kruger said.

"We've gotta bounce back," Kruger said of the 83-69 loss to the Sooners. "We did some good things in the ball game, but not for enough minutes. We have to get more good minutes."

And, with K-State traveling to Iowa State Saturday, good minutes would be a welcome sight for Kruger, considering Hilton Coliseum in Ames has not been too friendly to its visitors this season.

However, the conference's top three teams were able to sneak out of Ames with victories. No. 2 Missouri needed a last-second three-pointer to win, 95-93, while No. 11 Oklahoma and No. 1 Kansas were able to narrowly escape with five-point victories.

"It'll be tough. Ames is a tough place to play and it always has been," Kruger said. "They've been playing awfully well. They've had some tough losses."

And the tough losses haven't come just at home. One of them came earlier in the season at Bramlage Coliseum when K-State converted a 10-point halftime deficit into a 72-68 victory.

In that victory, the 'Cats were able to overcome a 17-point first-half performance by Victor Alexander, who scored 27 for the contest.

"We'll try to do something different," Kruger said of defending Alexander. "Although we played him better in the second half, we let him loose there, and he had a big first half."

The 'Cats are now 14-11 and 4-5 in conference play, and stand one-half game behind fourth-place Oklahoma State and the very spot that Kruger thinks the Wildcats need to be in at the regular season's end to ensure a berth in the NCAAAs.

And, with his final season quickly nearing the end, senior guard Steve Henson has looked like a man possessed since the Missouri victory, in which all of his 18 points came in the second half.

"He hit some big shots for us," Kruger said of Henson's performance at Oklahoma, where he scored 21 points. "He's put together a string of some pretty good games, and he seems to be shooting the ball with a lot more confidence right now."

Jean Derouillere leads the Wildcats with a 16.4 point average, while Henson is tallying nearly 15 a game.

K-State will return home Tuesday night to entertain Oklahoma State in an 8:05 contest.

Oklahoma guard Mike Harris tries to keep the ball from being stripped away by K-State guard Askia Jones Wednesday night at the Lloyd Noble Center in Norman, Okla. Harris retained control of the ball, and the No. 11 Sooners retained control of the game, winning 85-69.

Fourth-year baseball coach Mike Clark will lead his squad against No. 9 Arkansas this weekend in the Wildcats' season-opening series.

Baseball squad to open

By David Svoboda
Sports Reporter

Though Manhattan is covered by a blanket of snow, spring officially begins this weekend for the K-State baseball team when Coach Mike Clark's Wildcats open play against ninth-ranked Arkansas in Fayetteville.

For K-State, which finished 32-23 a year ago, the opening three-game set against the Razorbacks will provide a good test. The two teams face off in a doubleheader Saturday and a single contest Sunday.

"It's kind of an evaluation weekend for us," said Clark, who has a 94-71 record in his previous three years at K-State. "It's a chance to see us perform against somebody else, and that somebody else happens to be a good team."

Clark's team has an inner defense with several familiar faces and an outfield that may have three new ones.

The Wildcat catcher will be senior Dan Skala, with returnees Chris Hmielewski and Kevin Kaufman seeing time at first base. The double play combination of Jeff Troll and Craig Wilson remains intact at second base and shortstop, and Brad Rippelmeyer returns to patrol the hot corner.

Hmielewski will be one of the starting Wildcat pitchers, and when he sees time at first, Kaufman will be the designated hitter. In any event, Kaufman, who is not particularly known for his speed, will be the leadoff hitter.

"Kevin does everything but run," Clark said. "He works the count, looks at pitches, will take the walk, and he's probably our best hitter right now. Hitting in the leadoff spot will give him 60 or so extra at bats."

Because of injuries to returnees Rusty Ringgenberg and David Amaro, the outfield will likely feature three players who have never played a Division I game for the Wildcats.

The leftfielder will either be Brian Culp, a transfer from Pepperdine, or Mike Dunaway, a returnee. In center, replacing all-America candidate Ringgenberg, will be L.J. Twynen. Scott Stroth, who played his high

Big 8 title looms for Lady Cats

By David Svoboda
Sports Reporter

While the men's team attempts to keep its slim NCAA tournament hopes alive Saturday afternoon against Iowa State in Ames, the women's basketball squad will play host to their Cyclone counterparts at 7 Saturday night in Bramlage Coliseum in an attempt to move one step closer to the Big Eight championship.

The Lady Cats, now 17-7 overall and 9-2 in conference play, are coming off a 92-88 win over Oklahoma Wednesday that lifted the team into sole possession of the conference lead.

Though the Cyclones have struggled in Big Eight play and have been a second-division team the entire conference campaign, assistant coach Susan Kubala cautioned against taking Iowa State too lightly.

"They're a tough team to play," said Kubala, who was pulling double duty in scouting Iowa State after interim coach Gaye Griffin was snowed in at Memphis, Tenn., Thursday night.

"They've got two of the best players in the conference in Vanessa Ward and Shelly Coyle, and they've lost some games on the road that were very close."

Ward and Coyle have indeed been the Cyclone leaders. Coyle, a senior forward from Spring Green, Wis., averages a team-leading 17.4 points and 8.2 rebounds a game. Ward, a senior from Miami, Fla., averages 14.4 points and 4.3 rebounds a game.

In the first meeting between the two teams, K-State took advantage of 34 Cyclone turnovers and a 36.2 percent Iowa State shooting performance in posting an 80-61 win. Four Lady Cat players scored in double figures in that game.

Kubala said K-State's ability to get the ball up and down the floor would be a key in duplicating the success the Lady Cats achieved in Ames.

"We need to get the ball down the floor and run the break," she said. "If we can keep it an up-tempo game and keep it under control, we've got a good chance."

Kubala also pointed to the first

K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau announced earlier this week that freshman Angie Gover will be redshirted for medical reasons.

Gover, a Topeka West product, will have surgery to remove a small bone from each foot.

"It's certainly a disappointment that she can't compete at this time," Bietau said. "However, it's definitely in her long-term best interest."

Gover had achieved success earlier this season, as she had already compiled a 2-0 record at the No. 5 singles slot and teamed with Suzanne Sim for a 2-0 record in doubles.

KSU Open provides prep for upcoming loop meet

By Dan Wicker
Sports Reporter

With the Big Eight Indoor Championships one week away, K-State coach John Capriotti hopes Saturday's KSU Open indoor track meet will provide a good tune-up for his athletes.

K-State will be playing host to its largest meet of the year in Ahearn Field House with the field events beginning at 10:30 a.m. and track events following at 11:00 a.m.

More than 600 athletes from every junior college and small college in the state will compete, as will Big Eight counterparts Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma State and Colorado.

"It is important as a tune-up for the conference meet and for everyone to stay healthy," Capriotti said. "We will run people in odd races to get them ready for Big Eight."

K-State was a bit overwhelmed in its last meet at the Husker Invitational, but Capriotti said Saturday's meet should still be highly competitive, considering it is the last chance for good performances before the Big Eight meet.

"With the type of meet it is, (the athletes) will react very well," Capriotti said. "There will be some good performances, because it will affect the seeds of the Big Eight meet."

K-State will rest a lot of its athletes or run them in fewer events to assure that the squad is ready for the conference meet.

Laticia Joyner and Carla Shannon will be out of competition this weekend due to a strained quadriceps and a sore hip, respectively. Marcus Wright, who ran four races last weekend at Lincoln, will only be competing in the 4x400-meter relay, and a lot of distance runners will watch from the stands because Capriotti says their overall race mileage can really add up.

"They have been racing all season and should be ready to go," Capriotti said. "It is more important to rest, than race."

Capriotti also stressed the rest as being important because Saturday is going to be a long day.

"I don't want them to hang around the meet all day," Capriotti said. "I want them to run and get them home."

On the women's side K-State is still holding many respectable spots in the top three on the Big Eight honor roll. Joy Jones is ranked third in the 400 meters. Janet Haskin and Angie Barry are ranked at Nos. 2 and 3 in the 3,000 meters.

Carla Shannon stands at first in the triple jump and second in the long jump. Angie Miller sits atop the list in the shot put. Karen McGaughey is third in the pentathlon, and Connie Teaberry is third in the high jump.

For the men, Jared Storm is ranked second in the 1,000 meters, David Warders second in the 5,000 meters, Charles Armstead third in the long jump, and Orlo Berry and Dwayne Murphy are at second and third in the triple jump.

The coaches' poll for the Big Eight Championships was released Wednesday and K-State looks to be in line for a shot at the title with the women picked to finish second behind Nebraska and the men are picked to wind up third, behind Nebraska and Iowa State.

Students form group

New organization concerned with tenure

By Gregory A. Branson
Collegian Reporter

Changing the way tenure is granted to K-State faculty is a goal of Students for Excellence in Education, a new organization on campus that was officially recognized Wednesday by the Union Activities Board.

"We're worried about the deterioration of education not only at K-State, but also around the country as a whole," said Sandy O'Neil, senior in history and a founding member of SEE.

Tenure at K-State is based on teaching, research and service to the field of study and is usually achieved in about six years, Vice Provost Robert Kruh said.

"Tenure is becoming an expert in a field of study," Kruh said. "As an expert, the scholar is going to express opinions that aren't always popular. Tenure is a means of ensuring that freedom of expression won't be compromised."

SEE is concerned that certain faculty who are excellent teachers are not valued as highly as those who do research and are denied tenure more readily when they do not fulfill research and publication requirements.

Bill Fately, professor of chemistry and faculty adviser of SEE, said teaching should receive more emphasis when tenure is considered.

"Those of us on faculty believe teaching is what we're here for and the other things come after that," Fately said. "Sometimes I think that gets lost."

"In talking to other students, there are stories from across campus of students who had wonderful teachers who wind up leaving K-State because teaching is not sufficiently recognized," O'Neil said.

SEE wants to see some teachers granted tenure for research, and some granted tenure for teaching abilities.

"I believe there are people who are destined to be teachers, and I don't object to tenure being granted 100 percent on teaching," Fately said. "There can be dual ways of granting tenure, and I don't want one way being the only way."

Kruh said the University requires research on the argument that it wants faculty who not only communicate with the students, but contribute to their field of expertise.

"The whole learning process is first and foremost," he said. "But part of that learning process is contribution."

If a faculty member does not have expertise, that faculty member could become "outdated," Kruh said.

"We have teachers who are top-flight with students, but for various reasons they don't attend to their own professional development," he said. "We want them to achieve some authoritative status from their own research and experience. We want them to contribute to the knowledge as well as impart that knowledge to the students."

Some K-State colleges are already attempting to even out the disparity between teaching and research.

College of Agriculture Dean Walter Woods said in the past several years, teaching, research and Extension personnel have been promoted with equal effectiveness.

"In agriculture, because of the diversity, we evaluate their excellence in how they do their assignment, and how creatively and productively they do their assignment," he said.

Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, said different disciplines should have different requirements. Within engineering, different departments have different research responsibilities. But that doesn't mean each faculty member must do a lot of research, he said.

"I'm prepared to support truly wonderful teachers without research, but also truly wonderful re-

Trip Shakespeare on tour

CONTRIBUTING REVIEWER

Trip Shakespeare — a band from the Northern wood that has spawned so many great rock 'n' roll bands, Minneapolis, Minn. — is touring from Wisconsin to San Francisco to promote their upcoming label debut on A&M records.

The four-member band sold out two nights at the Bottleneck in Lawrence last weekend to a capacity crowd of advanced-ticket holders.

Trip's music seems influenced only by their own originality and ability, which defines an unmistakable sound. Brothers Dan and Matt Wilson, obviously attuned to each other in their shows, create equally interwoven and precise guitar lines.

Backed by John Munson's melodic bass and Elaine Harris's stand up drumming (reminiscent of Maureen Tucker's Velvet Underground days), Trip's rhythm section creates a hypnotic groove that leaves audiences spellbound.

The band's most outstanding feature is the vocal ability of the Wilsons and Munson incorporating a three-part harmony, which distinguishes Trip's sound from any other.

Equipment trouble during the first song was promptly taken care of while Matt Wilson appeased the crowd with a humorous, impromptu tune, "Driving Under the Influence of Love." And by the third song, "Vines," the audience was firmly entrenched in the experience.

Trip quickly moved into songs from their album to be released April 17. The songs continued with the style and energy of their previous work, but were more refined, tighter and marked by better writing.

Trip had definitely found their groove upon playing "Turtledove," which was indicative of the newer material, mixing precise harmonies and meaningful lyrics, always written by Matt Wilson.

"Applehead Man," which ended the first set, worked the crowd into a dancing frenzy before quietly easing into a jam, which slowly rose in intensity until the final verse released the tension into an uproar of mayhem.

Seven of the 10 songs in the second set were possibilities for their next album. Their incredible stage presence allowed them to play slow, fast, new and old songs, all with enthusiastic crowd reaction.

"Reception" ended the 20-song performance and was perhaps the most captivating song of the night. Singer Matt Wilson added a monologue to the song, which left the audience curious for every line and eagerly awaiting the outcome of his sad tale of lost love.

Wilson typically exemplified the intensity of his power over the bar and waited a few seconds before finishing each line, good-naturedly torturing the awaiting crowd.

As an encore, Trip played a cult favorite "Slacks" that had been requested through screams from the audience. In the song Wilson proclaimed he "wore the magic pants," much to his brother and Munson's denial.

Then came Trip's trademark song, See TRIP, Page 10

Lecturer defines division of public, private spheres

By Angie Huff
Collegian Reporter

A division of the public and private spheres is fine as long as the people within it are treated equally, Humanities Lecturer Susan Moller Okin said Thursday in the K-State Union.

But Okin, a professor of politics at Brandeis University in Massachusetts, said the division of public and private has flaws.

Okin's lecture, "Rethinking the Dichotomy of Public and Private," focused on ways in which the separation between public, state and private, personal life are viewed by various philosophers and her own view of the separation between the two.

"The origins of the differences between the public sector of our lives and the private sectors date back to classic Greek thought," Okin said.

The Greeks placed no value on the private person, Okin said. In fact "idiotic," which meant idiot or stupid, was used to describe a private person, she said.

Problems exist in the division of the public and private sectors. But in mainstream political theory, the concepts of public and private continue to be used, Okin said.

There are two major ambiguities in most discussions of the division of public and private — the terminology used to describe the public and private sectors, and the division of labor between the sexes in the public and private sectors, Okin said.

For example, "state" is used to mean public and "society" is used to mean private, she said. Likewise, the word "non-domestic" is used to mean public and the word "domestic" is used to mean private. But civil society, which refers to the marketplace, churches and universities, is included in the public sector under the first definition and in the private sector under the second one.

A second ambiguity results directly from patriarchal practices of the past, Okin said. A man can move back and forth from the public sector to the private with few problems, but a woman's place is only in the private sector, Okin said.

In other words, a woman is controlled by a man when in fact a woman has privacy rights of her own, she said.

"(This kind of thought) still continues implicitly in political theory," Okin said.

The public and private are interrelated in four distinct ways, she said.

First, there is power in personal life and power within the family, such as the authority of a husband over a wife and a parent over a child.

Secondly, gender differences do exist in the private sphere. Thirdly, the state can choose whether to interfere with the private sector and has chosen to do so, particularly in terms of marriage, childcare and divorce.

Fourthly, in the minds of men, the private and the public aspects of women's lives seem intertwined, and women in the public sphere are either ignored or not seen.

Unless the issue of public and private is carefully examined, a humanistic theory of justice to include all people cannot be obtained, Okin said.

Okin has recently finished a book titled "Justice, Gender and the Family," which is the first feminist critique of contemporary political theory. In it, Okin argues as well for concrete changes in laws, public policy and social institutions.

The book is a sequel to her earlier work, "Women in Western Political Thought," which systematically criticizes Western tradition from Aristotle and Plato to John Stuart Mill, said John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy.

out of his faith and a strong sense of hope for the ultimate victory of justice over apartheid."

"Farisani is a man who stands for the truth," said Jonathan Ramathoka, graduate student in agricultural education and citizen of South Africa. "He has been ill-treated, yet he is very bold as far as the liberation is concerned. Of all the pastors I have met in South Africa, Farisani is the one who stood up most for the truth. Very few people would do what he did."

In addition to the lecture, Farisani will deliver a sermon Sunday at the First Presbyterian Church on Leavenworth Avenue. Services are at 8:30 a.m. and 11 a.m. He will also conduct a seminar on church response to apartheid at 9:30 a.m. at the church.

meeting between the two schools as possibly the best Lady Cat defensive performance of the season.

"The key to that game was our intensity," she said. "It was probably our best performance of the year, in terms of picking up in passing lanes and in full court. In looking at the tape, they had a lot of shots from 12 to 15 feet, but they had a hand in their face almost every time."

K-State has a stellar 10-1 record in Bramlage this season, with the only loss coming in the opener against Maryland. The Lady Cats have a 20-3 mark in the coliseum in two years.

school ball at Topeka's Washburn Rural, will start in right.

Clark has selected senior David Hierholzer and Hmielewski as two of his three starting pitchers against Arkansas, which returns five starters from its 1989 team that finished fifth in the College World Series.

The third starter will likely be Sean Pedersen, a freshman. Another newcomer, Kent Hipp, will get the call if Pedersen doesn't.

After a January and early February consisting of workouts and intrasquad scrimmage games, Clark believes his team is ahead of schedule. But it's time to find out how far ahead on the diamond.

"I think we're quite a bit ahead of where we've been at this time in previous years," Clark said. "Especially team concept-wise. We've had a chance to go over and review a few things we normally wouldn't touch on until games."

"I think defensively we're going to be an awfully good baseball team. The only drawback I see, if it is one, is youth. It's a minus, but yet it's a plus. It has given us the enthusiasm, the work habits, and an ability not to be as satisfied with where we're at ... that we need."

searchers without as much teaching," Rathbone said. "We try to reward the people who are getting the job done."

SEE is concerned that research is getting precedent over good teaching.

"This institution identifies itself as both a research and a teaching institution," O'Neil said. "At this point, teaching is under-weighted. Both ought to be rated equally."

Although SEE is concerned with faculty, it intends to allow only student membership.

"I think it is important that the people who are most directly affected by the under-valuation of teaching communicate their concerns," O'Neil said. "We students are the ones who pay the money and are told we can expect good teaching. When we find that there are good teachers who are not being sufficiently recognized, it's frustrating to us."

More student participation in the tenure process may be one of the solutions to the problem. Using student evaluations and interviews as a boost instead of a requirement to fulfill may allow some of the more teaching-oriented faculty members to acquire tenure.

"We would like input from students to contribute to the positive atmosphere and not be just a hurdle you have to overcome," Fately said.

bunal over the athletic fee issue.

"I have no idea where he came up with that," Johnson said.

The question of conflict of interest due to having a member of the cabinet serve on Tribunal came after Johnson withdrew the appointment of Todd Heitschmidt as ASK campus director because of another conflict of interest. Heitschmidt is a student senator and also serves as the student representative to faculty senate.

Johnson said Heitschmidt had agreed to relinquish his Senate seat if he was appointed ASK director, but he would be allowed to remain a representative to Faculty Senate. However, Johnson learned that Faculty Senate Constitution forbids a non-Senate member from serving as student representative to Faculty Senate. Heitschmidt then refused to resign his Senate seat.

Heitschmidt said he was disappointed by Johnson's decision to withdraw his appointment.

"We have our most important day coming up, Lobby Day, and we don't have an ASK director," Heitschmidt said.

Holding both positions of senator and ASK director is allowed by the constitution and has been done in the past.

"I don't think anyone should be ASK campus director and a student senator and faculty senate representative at the same time," Johnson said.

Stumpff, however, said Johnson was setting a double standard.

"He claims on the Heitschmidt affair that it was a conflict of interest and he doesn't apply the same standards to his Tribunal appointees," he said.

recently, you can see he hasn't veered much from the charter," Fullagar said.

Mandela has talked about nationalizing certain industries and establishing a non-racial government based on the idea of one man, one vote, he said.

Fullagar said Mandela is by far the most popular black political leader in South Africa, but he faces a number of opposing political factions within and outside of the ANC that developed during his 27 years in prison.

"Young, militant groups are pushing for radical change. Mandela has to try to balance that with more cautious groups who want slower change," he said. "It's an extremely difficult task to balance demands in a climate characterized by such high expectations. I do think Mandela is the only person who can carry it off."

Fallon talked about the theology of liberation in South Africa and the actions of church groups against the system.

He said liberation theology helps build world awareness and compassion for oppressed people.

"I think the church's key role in the liberation movement in the world has been the confrontation of the institutional sin of a system such as apartheid," Fallon said. "With people involved in liberation theology, I have experienced a sense of hope for the future. That hope is alive with the people who are struggling for the future."

She said guests have come from almost every country in the world. One man reserved a room by letter from London. When he called them at 7 o'clock on the night he was to arrive, Betty Anderson tried to give directions from I-70, but he became confused.

the war against drug abuse, he said, "You're on the front line," Hayden said to the students at the conference. "You will be the one that can make the difference."

"As governor, I appreciate the commitment you made to learn about and implement a project graduation activity in each of the 70 Kansas schools represented here," he said.

Hayden said that Project Graduation is more than just a one-night party. It is a statement about a lifestyle in which students can have fun and feel comfortable without alcohol and drugs.

"It says that our communities, their young people and the adults alike, want to prevent drinking and driving during these high-risk times and throughout the year," he said.

Weishapl said the governor said nothing different than what the students had heard before, but he gave different insights.

The Rev. T.S. Farisani, a South African pastor, delivered a Lou Douglas Lecture Sunday in the K-State Union Forum Hall.

Pastor gives speech

Struggle continues; blacks need help to end apartheid

By Cosima Hadidi
Staff Reporter

The South African government has failed blacks politically, socially, religiously, economically and educationally, said the Rev. T.S. Farisani, a South African pastor who delivered a Lou Douglas Lecture Sunday.

Blacks were failed politically by denying Nelson Mandela his place in the government and 87 percent of the population their right to vote, Farisani told an audience of about 200.

They were failed socially by keeping people apart rather than allowing them to get to know each other.

They were failed theologically by using religion to justify apartheid.

They were failed economically by having 88 percent of the work performed by blacks, while 92 percent of the profits went to whites.

They were failed educationally by denying blacks an education to prevent them from aspiring for positions reserved to whites such as pilots or supreme justice judges, he said.

"The African National Congress was founded in 1912 and applied peaceful methods asking for the rights of blacks so that in 1960 the first Nobel peace prize ever awarded to a South African went to the leader of the ANC," Farisani said. "The reaction of the government was to ban the ANC, and this raised a million questions."

Farisani, who was imprisoned and tortured on five different occasions, said it was true that he had suffered tremendously.

"But there are millions who suffered ten to 20 times more than me," Farisani said. "My suffering only became known because I am a church leader and have traveled and spoken of the injustice. I speak on behalf of my people who cannot travel or who are afraid to speak."

He said the South African government uprooted four million people from their homes and detained about 60,000 people and tortured many of them. Farisani said while he was as ecstatic as anyone about the release of Mandela, there was still much left to do to improve the unchanged conditions for the black majority in South Africa.

"In the past 48 hours many people have been imprisoned and are being tortured for supporting Mandela," he said.

Farisani said he is living in exile in the United States and risks imprisonment if he were to return to South Africa.

"If you ask me what the reforms meant to me, I would have to say not much," he said.

He said he was optimistic about the future, but the struggle must continue until all obstacles for negotiations are removed and apartheid is ended.

"We are trying to help (President F.W.) de Klerk and cooperate with him to the degree that we feel that he is honest and wants a non-racial and united South Africa," Farisani said.

He said President Bush is more helpful than former president Reagan to the cause of black South Africans and that American citizens should write to their government asking it to keep the sanctions on South Africa intact.

"Keep the lid firm until de Klerk lifts the lid of apartheid from our people," Farisani said.

He also encouraged the audience to help the ANC if only by writing letters to Congress, the South African embassy and the government in Pretoria.

"Write to your government congratulating it for its recognition of the authentic leaders of the black people and asking it not to lift sanctions until the oppressed ask for it. You should also write de Klerk congratulating him on his reforms and asking him to save lives now that he has made the first step," Farisani said.

"Rev. Farisani represents the heart and soul of our people in South Africa," said Yemi Ogunrinola, graduate student in food science.

"I really enjoyed the lecture," said Kenny Kincaid, senior in mathematics and English and a

Criticism of choices continues

By Kirk Caraway
Collegian Reporter

Appointments to Tribunal continue to draw criticism as Student Body President Todd Johnson prepares a new list of nominees to present to Student Senate Thursday.

Senate last week postponed indefinitely Johnson's five appointments to Tribunal, the highest body in the judicial branch of student government.

Johnson was criticized for passing over two former Tribunal members in favor of two applicants with no judicial experience.

"Todd just wanted to pack the Tribunal with a bunch of inexperienced people," said Teresa Pennington, sophomore in political science and former Tribunal member. "I think he's doing a lot of harm to the University."

Pennington worked as campaign manager for Ira Bolden, who ran against Johnson for student body president. She said this may be why Johnson passed her over.

"I think what he is doing is political," Pennington said.

Bill Nelson, another former Tribunal member passed over for reappointment, wasn't bitter about the situation, but questioned Johnson's reasoning.

"I don't mind not being reappointed," Nelson said. "I just have to wonder about his motivation for that."

Nelson took exception to Attorney General Rob Dieringer's comments about picking a group that works well together in Friday's Collegian. "You want some disagreement," Nelson said. "You don't want a rubber stamp."

Johnson said Sunday afternoon that he will try to push through the same list of names with the possible exception of Johnny Gaffney, sophomore in pre-law. Later Sunday, Gaffney withdrew his name from consideration.

"After discussing the situation, I decided to withdraw," Gaffney said. "I feel I can benefit the students and the University better through the lobby team."

Gaffney said he didn't expect the unfavorable reaction his nomination got from Senate, but some senators objected to his nomination because he serves on Johnson's cabinet.

"The question of a conflict of interest was unforeseen," he said. "The point was well taken by me and the others involved."

Johnson was unavailable for comment after Gaffney disclosed his decision to withdraw, but did comment earlier on his Tribunal selections.

"We saw an opportunity to get some new people in there that were well-suited," Johnson said. "With a new group, we can educate them all on the same level."

Johnson said he believes Senate didn't approve his appointments because they were unfamiliar with the candidates. He defended his selections and said they were the best of the 12 applicants interviewed by him, Dieringer and Chief of Staff

Enrollment growth continues

Wefald: Budget problems, increase worsen tight year

By Lori Mikesell
Staff Reporter

The increase in student enrollment continued this semester with a total of 19,046 students enrolled for spring semester classes.

The official 20th day of classes total represents an increase of 1,208 students over last spring.

University officials had expected a record spring enrollment following the fall 1989 record-setting enrollment of 20,110 students, said Registrar Don Foster in a press release.

The enrollment increase comes at a time when the University is facing state budget cuts.

"Because of the two-year enrollment adjustment lag, we knew that fiscal year 1990 would be difficult," President Jon Wefald said. "Now with the state having a fiscal problem and requiring us to reduce our budget by $1.2 million with only a few months remaining in the fiscal year, it has made an already tight situation worse."

In 1986, Wefald said the University was in the midst of an irreversible enrollment decline. Since then, enrollment has grown each year.

"Isn't it great to be a part of a university that is so popular that everybody wants to come here?" Wefald said.

Increased growth is anticipated again next fall, Wefald said, but a relative stabilization in enrollment is expected from 1990 on.

"We're stretched right now. We're reaching the limit of what our facilities can handle," Wefald said. "We'll be maxed out at 21,000."

On-campus enrollment was up 1,142 students, a 6.9 percent increase over a year ago, Foster said in the release. Within that total, graduate student enrollment increased to 2,570 students, an increase of 91 over last spring's graduate enrollment of 2,479.

"Kansas State University's academic quality continues to be recognized by the students of Kansas," Wefald said. "Seventy percent of this year's fall freshman class had a high school grade point average of B or better. It included over 200 valedictorians and salutatorians."

All colleges reported increased enrollments, except architecture and design, which has an enrollment cap, the release said.

The College of Arts and Sciences reported the most new students, 644, a 15.2 percent increase, bringing total enrollment in that college to 4,876. The College of Education also reported a 15.2 percent increase in students, bringing its total enrollment to 1,494.

High spring enrollments are directly attributable to increased retention, said Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life.

"This record spring enrollment is a direct result of efforts by deans, department heads, faculty and staff members to ensure that each K-State student has a quality educational experience," Bosco said.

Lifestyle often secret for local gays

Gay Life In MANHATTAN

By Julie Andsager
Features Editor

A small percentage of Manhattan's men and women have a secret they share with only a few special people. These men and women are homosexual.

According to sociologist Morton Hunt's 1974 report, 2 percent of men and 1 percent of women in the United States are exclusively homosexual. An additional 23 percent of men and 14 percent of women are bisexual. Hunt's statistics are considered the most up to date, according to "Our Sexuality," by Robert Crooks and Karla Bauer.

The number of homosexuals in Manhattan may be higher than in other towns its size because of the University, said Kent Donovan, adviser for the Gay and Lesbian Resource Center.

The GLRC is one of the only facilities available strictly for gay men and lesbians in Manhattan.

Manhattan is more accepting of homosexuality than other towns its size, however, said Eunice Dorst, co-owner of the Kindred Spirit Book Store. San Francisco, New York and even Kansas City are more tolerant than small towns, she said.

Dorst, who is from England, said her experience with tolerance of homosexuality in the United States is not that great.

A male professor, who asked to remain anonymous, said jokingly that there is no gay life in Manhattan.

"One of the problems in Manhattan is there isn't as yet what I would call a gay and lesbian community," the professor said. "Sociologists say 10 percent of the population in the United States is gay. There must be hundreds upon hundreds of lesbians and gay men in Manhattan, but you'd never know it to walk around."

Manhattan has gay and lesbian networks, the professor said. A gay man will meet another gay man, who will introduce him to others, and so on.

Dorst has lived in Manhattan six years. After being married twice and having children, she realized she is a lesbian.

"Personally, I haven't had any problems," Dorst said. "Nor do I run up and down the street screaming 'I'm a lesbian.'"

Gay men and lesbians refer to the process of admitting their homosexuality as "coming out." The reference is short for "coming out of the closet."

"Coming out is a process," Dorst said. "You don't just come out. I guess everyone starts reaching a point of deciding not to hide anymore. It is a very personal, individual choice. I'm still in that process."

Part of that choice involves deciding whom to tell. Dorst said her children know she is a lesbian, but her mother doesn't.

"It depends on how well I know them and why I decide to tell them," said Lydia, a K-State senior and GLRC president, who asked to have her last name withheld. "With most people, it's kind of funny because most of them say they know already."

Lydia said family background often influences the decision of whether to come out.

The professor agreed, saying religion has a strong effect on the choice to come out.

"The biggest problem gay men and women have in my experience is internalized misgivings about themselves," the professor said. "They heard when they were youngsters that homosexuals are terrible people."

"When people know somebody they like who is gay, they have a

Auto accident kills 2 students

By Tomari Quinn
Staff Reporter

Two freshmen were killed in a one-car accident early Sunday morning near Larned.

Jennifer Bedell, freshman in physical education from Shawnee, and Tamatha Borck, freshman in pre-law from Larned, were killed when Borck's car left U.S. Highway 183 and struck a guardrail 12 miles west of Larned, said a spokeswoman for the Kansas Highway Patrol. Both Borck and Bedell were pronounced dead at the scene.

The spokeswoman said Borck's 1986 Chevrolet Camaro crossed the center line, striking a guard rail. The car then slid into a bridge railing where it became airborne and landed in a creek bed.

Both women were ejected from the car, the spokeswoman said. As of 1 a.m. today, Highway Patrol officers had not determined who was driving the car.

The accident occurred at 2:27 a.m.

Sunday three miles south of the junction of U.S. Highway 183 and Kansas Highway 156 in Pawnee County, according to Highway Patrol reports.

Road conditions were considered normal at the time of the accident, the spokeswoman said.

Lisa Harms, senior in accounting and a member of Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority, said both Borck, 19, and Bedell, 18, were Kappas. Borck and Bedell were residents of Ford Hall.

Harms said Borck and Bedell would be missed. She declined to say more because of her grief.

Melane Burger, sophomore in business, went to high school with Borck.

"She always seemed so happy, always bouncing around," Burger said. "Tami was always friendly to everyone and was really popular in high school."

A funeral service for Borck will be 9:30 a.m. Tuesday at the Sacred

Protesters storm headquarters

BUCHAREST, Romania (AP) — Demonstrators yelling "Down with Communism!" smashed their way into interim government headquarters with rocks and iron rods Sunday in the most violent protest since the December pro-democracy revolution.

Soldiers fell back before more than 1,000 demonstrators and about 500 protesters poured inside. An official said not enough troops were on hand to keep order.

The state news agency Rompres said more than 20 paratroopers were severely wounded, but reporters saw only two injured soldiers.

Hundreds of troop reinforcements arrived and pushed back the crowd, which numbered around 5,000 at its height, and 10 armored personnel carriers were positioned in front of the building.

Ruling party keeps majority

TOKYO (AP) — Japan's conservative governing party held on to its 34-year-old majority in Parliament's powerful lower house Sunday, but scandals and an unpopular tax may have cost it nearly three dozen seats in the closely watched election.

Prime Minister Toshiki Kaifu called the preliminary results "a form of purification" for his troubled Liberal Democratic Party.

The secretary-general of the main opposition Socialist Party, Tsuruo Yamaguchi, disagreed: "Simply being elected does not mean one is absolved." The Socialists made strong gains.

The political outlook was clouded because the opposition holds a majority in Parliament's upper house, making it difficult to pass major legislation or deal with trade problems with the United States.

Cheney flies to Philippines

MANILA, Philippines (AP) — Defense Secretary Dick Cheney flew into Manila Monday for security talks, facing a rare snub from President Corason Aquino and anger over what many Filipinos consider a U.S. failure to meet its obligations.

Leftist groups announced plans for demonstrations on Monday to demand closing of the six American military bases in the Philippines.

Cheney, on a two-week tour of the Pacific rim that included a stop in South Korea, arrived from Hong Kong and was taken by helicopter to the Department of National Defense at Camp Aguinaldo for talks with Defense Secretary Fidel Ramos.

TWA jetliner evacuated

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Nearly 200 people were evacuated from a TWA jetliner Sunday when the plane's cabin filled with thick, acrid smoke, authorities said.

Three passengers suffered minor ankle injuries leaving the plane by its emergency escape chutes, said Fire Department spokesman Pat Marek.

One of the passengers was taken to Daniel Freeman Memorial Hospital. The other two and a crew member who suffered smoke inhalation were treated at the scene, Marek said.

The Lockheed L-1011, with 180 passengers and 12 crew members aboard, was being prepared for takeoff for John F. Kennedy Airport in New York when smoke poured into the cabin shortly before 4:30 p.m., prompting early reports that the craft was on fire, Marek said.

"Further investigation revealed there was no fire," he added.

Maryland motel explodes

HAGERSTOWN, Md. (AP) — A natural gas leak apparently triggered an explosion and fire that ripped through a three-story motel Sunday morning, killing at least four people and forcing some guests to jump from windows.

The 5:30 a.m. blast blew out the middle front of the 62-unit Super 8 Motel, throwing debris as far as 300 feet from the building, Fire Chief Gary Hawbaker said.

"When we first arrived there were people hanging out a third-floor window, and we took seven of them out," Hawbaker said. "Their rooms had already filled with smoke. The whole front of the building — first, second and third floors — was blown out."

Hawbaker said there was a natural gas line in the middle of the fire, "so we couldn't put out the rest of the fire until the gas was shut off." It took firefighters about 30 minutes to shut off the gas, he said.

Just before the explosion, a guest told a desk clerk there was a gas smell in the laundry room, said Joan Ganje-Fischer, spokeswoman for Super 8 Motels Inc., based in Aberdeen, S.D.

After calling the gas company, the clerk was trying to shut off the gas when the explosion occurred.

"He was right in the center of the explosion when it happened," Ganje-Fischer said. "He came back to the front desk and his hair was on fire."

Bank officials try to recover

OTTAWA (AP) — The chairman of Franklin Savings Association said he hopes the savings and loan will be returned to him, and regulators said there is a good chance it can emerge from federal control.

Ernest M. Fleischer, 57, joined teams of Franklin executives and regulators who worked on recovery efforts Saturday in the association's corporate headquarters.

Fleischer said he will help operate the thrift, the largest in Kansas, and said he does not plan to file lawsuits to block regulators.

Federal regulators seized Franklin Friday, describing the thrift as financially insolvent.

Franklin, with assets of $11.4 billion, had a capital account of about $350 million, which is within regulatory limits.

But because of a complex hedging process to protect the company from interest rate swings, the company had deferred $200 million in losses it suffered on the futures market.

Senate approves BSU funds

Student Senate Thursday night approved a special allocation of $1,250 for Black Student Union to help send members to the BSU Big Eight conference at Iowa State University in Ames.

The bill was moved special orders to get the money in time for the conference Thursday through Sunday. BSU originally approached Senate last fall to fund the trip through the Educational Opportunity Fund, but was refused because the trip had always been funded out of the reserves for contingencies account.

The bill allocates $25 scholarships to 50 students to help defray the cost of the trip. Aireka Key, BSU president, said 76 students will be making the trip.

The conference is an annual event to help black students deal with the problems and pressures of being minority students at predominantly white universities, Key said.

Five of Kansas' best bread bakers, all from different regions of the state, gathered in Justin Hall for the state's first wheat bread bake-off, part of the Celebrate Kansas promotion. Each of the runners-up was handed a check for $100 and the winner received $500.

Bakeoff kneading begins early

By Clinton Wolf
Collegian Reporter

By 8 a.m. Saturday, the kneading had begun. Five of Kansas' best bread bakers had gathered in Justin Hall for the state's first wheat bread bake-off, part of the Celebrate Kansas promotion.

Most of the contestants, all regional winners, arrived the night before.

The youngest baker was Anita Allen, age 17, from Burlington. She won in the southeast region. Allen said she arrived in town with her mother and cooking utensils at 3 a.m. Allen is a member of the Burlington High School girls basketball team. She said the team played its last home girls basketball game the night before the competition.

"We won by one point," Allen said.

Julia Kendall, the south-central regional winner, kneaded her Onion-

Wheat Braid bread dough in one of Justin's food preparation lab kitchens. She said she was apprehensive about the contest because she had no formal baking training in college or in 4-H.

"My grandma taught me how to make bread," Kendall said, her flour-covered hands buried in dough.

LaDean Bailey, who won the northwest regional at Colby, was having trouble getting her dough to rise. Bailey said the difference in altitude of almost 2000 feet between Colby and Manhattan was slowing the yeast.

Viola Unruh, the southwest regional winner, from Montezuma, said she was surprised to have defeated the 40 other contestants in her region.

K-State graduate Marilyn Friesen, who won the northeast regional in Perry, said she modified her recipe for five years before her husband, Dave, asked her to stop.

All 240 contestants who competed at the regional level had to be 14 or older and use at least 75 percent wheat flour and three or more "From the Land of Kansas" products.

Unruh's recipe was simply titled "Whole Wheat Bread." She said she thought she would lose to sweet bread entries at the regional contest.

"It's fairly popular at home," Unruh said, laughing. She said later that during her 35 years of baking she made most of the bread for her husband, extra farm help and three teenage boys, which gave her plenty of practice.

The judges were Joseph Ponte, professor of grain science and industry; Edgar Chambers, director of the sensory analysis center in Justin and coordinator of the event for the Department of Foods and Nutrition; Kathleen Kelly, food editor for the Wichita Eagle; and governor's wife Patti Hayden, who served as an honorary judge.

Allen's loaf of Honey Bread was the first out of the oven.

"You see, we could have slept in more but she said, 'No, we're getting up and getting there and getting done,'" Shirley Allen, Anita's mother, said.

Unruh made four loaves, and as they sat on the cooling racks she looked them over, examining them for size, color, firmness and uniformity. She said the loaf in the corner was the best, but it would not be cool by the time the judging started. She picked up another.

"I think perhaps it will be this one," Unruh said.

Five loaves, one from each contestant, were eventually wheeled on carts to the judges' room like patients to a surgical ward.

The first loaf to be scrutinized was Unruh's. The judges sat at a round

Drug hype and paranoia pervade politics

"No man, this is grass."
"You mean marijuana?"

Most everyone will remember this little exchange between Peter Fonda and Jack Nicholson in the classic film "Easy Rider." Some say this was the beginning of the end — drug use on the big screen. "Reefer Madness" was refuted by the son of Henry Fonda, who showed a restless generation how to live better through chemistry.

"No, you won't get hooked," is another line from the movie. Yes, that's right, all that stuff they were telling everyone about the dangers of drugs was slightly exaggerated. After "Easy Rider," the makers of the national drug policy had to change course. It became clear that the exaggerated claims were doing more harm than good. When kids found out the "experts" were lying about one joint turning you into a raving psychotic, they started questioning other things. The last thing a government needs is people who question things. That could lead to democracy, a dangerous thing for those with heavy investments in the power game.

Richard Nixon waged his own war on drugs in a hopeless attempt to put the "Easy Rider" genie back in the bottle. He basically used the same methods used today. He tried to shut off the supply from Latin America and fought for draconian punishments for drug offenders. But the whole program was flushed down the sewer even before Tricky Dick took the big fall down the very same hole.

But then came the '80s, Ronald Reagan and cocaine. Cocaine was the perfect drug for the Reign of Reagan. It made people feel like they were on top of the world while all around them it was crashing down. Reagan borrowed his way to popularity and dodged the collection man for eight long, tortuous years. He's now living in semi-retirement in the 666 house in Bel-Air, raking in $2 million a week to tour Japan and making dirty videotapes for his old buddy John Poindexter.

But his war on drugs lives on. George Bush has elevated the war to new heights. The rust-riddled Iron Curtain has come crashing down under its own weight, and Bush must find another war to fight. So desperate is the Texan with the New England accent that he risked life and limb to eat lunch with the presidents of Colombia, Peru and Bolivia in Cartagena last week. Surely they could have found a decent restaurant in Miami. The weather is just as nice and there aren't as many heat-seeking missiles fired at passing aircraft.

Kirk
Caraway

Collegian Columnist

Personally, I would have sent Dan Quayle in Air Force One as a decoy. Actually, if I were Bush, I would have picked someone more qualified to be vice president, like Pee Wee Herman. But now that Bush is stuck with the idiot from Indiana, he might as well use him. I've never heard of using decoys to hunt Quayle in the Bush, but this is the '90s. "Nothing so needs reforming as other people's habits." — Mark Twain.

People keep telling Bush that he can't win the drug war by trying to stop the supply. As long as Americans are eating cocaine like candy and the poor peasants in South America can't make even a miserable living growing anything else but coca, Bush will lose.

Education is the key, they say, along with "Just Say No." They try to scare potential users straight with TV commercials. I especially like the one with the frying pan and the egg. "This is drugs. This is your brain on drugs. Any questions?" Don't they realize people laugh at that message the same way dope smokers party to the movie "Reefer Madness?"

I remember when crack first came out in the media. "Experts" said that people would become addicted from the very first try. "There are no casual users," they said. But the studies show that only about one in five users become addicted to crack. This can be compared to statistics stating 90 percent of people who smoke cigarettes will become hooked. Again, those who don't learn from history are doomed to repeat it. The "Just Say No" campaign followed Nixon down the drain and will probably wash up on some beach like so much medical waste.

But even the statistics have been hyped. In an article in Scientific American, J. Michael Walsh, head of the applied research division of the National Institute on Drug Abuse, singled out two studies that prove drug abuse cost America billions of dollars in lost productivity and medical costs. Whether this is true or not, I don't know. But according to the article, a closer look at these studies done on employees at the Utah Power and Light Company and the Georgia Power Company showed that health costs for employees who tested positive for drugs were lower than those testing negative. Those Georgia workers testing positive for marijuana only were found to have a higher rate of promotion and 30 percent less absenteeism than non-pot users.

So do pot smokers make better employees? Who knows. Maybe they deal with pressure better. But I think the article pointed out two important things. One, that the government is not going to get anywhere if it keeps twisting the facts to scare people. The second lesson is that hiring and firing people because of drug tests can be very harmful, not just to the person getting axed, but to the company.

What is the solution? Legalization? More jails? Maybe we could get Dan Quayle to smoke crack on television as an example of the perils of drug abuse. Just imagine the man looking into the camera with those shifty eyes and babbling about not being born in this century. A sight like that could freak out the entire country. It's just a little too close to reality for me.

Black History Month provides recognition

February is Black History Month. It is a time to single out the contributions of blacks to civilization, but the recognition of these contributions should continue beyond this month.

Black people have played an important part in the development of society. Many of the foundations of modern culture have their roots in the ancient civilizations of Africa.

More recent contributors to history include George Washington Carver, Frederick Douglass, Duke Ellington, Shirley Chisholm, Jackie Robinson and Martin Luther King Jr.

The accomplishments of these individuals are no less important than those of Alexander Graham Bell, Susan B. Anthony or Babe Ruth. They all deserve mention in history books.

But historians often fail to mention the contributions of black individuals or of individuals of any ethnic group other than Caucasian. Only recently has the accepted version of history been revised to include other ethnic groups and only in a limited number of resources.

Having a documented history is important to the self images of people. There is a sense of worth and pride in knowing that one's ancestors distinguished themselves. It also gives people the incentive to build on the accomplishments of the past and enhance their future.

Black History Month has been an important way to honor the contributions of blacks and show how valuable these contributions are. Unfortunately, these contributions are often left out of the spotlight the other 11 months out of the year.

Priorities skewed

Editor,

The administration is not responsible for the financial crises threatening educational institutions in Kansas. It does, however, bear the responsibility for establishing University policies and protecting its educational mission. There is growing uneasiness among students here that our needs are not being identified as a priority. The sit-in at Farrell Library is one reflection of that uneasiness. The formation of Students for Excellence in Education is another example of growing student concern.

SEE was formed last semester. Our focus is the issue of teaching — namely, the ways in which teaching is being undervalued at K-State. This University identifies itself as a research institution. However, when the administration goes before the taxpayers of Kansas and when it seeks to recruit students, it promises that it is, equally, a teaching institution. Legislative support rests on that promise, and students come here expecting to find a faculty dedicated to teaching and an administration dedicated to the recruitment and retention of good teachers. We frequently find the good teachers, but we are also increasingly aware that they are not being given the support they deserve. Not for teaching.

There is a growing perception that K-State is losing sight of half its mission, the half that most directly affects students. While President Wefald supports the development of a core curriculum, the existing core programs — some called "service courses" — are clearly not regarded as a University priority. Nor can faculty members who are gifted teachers expect the kind of recognition given to faculty members who are concentrating on research.

We believe that an important balance is being threatened. When the demands of serious research and dedicated teaching are held in equal regard, students, faculty and the institution as a whole benefit. When research is emphasized at the expense of teaching, K-State becomes a far less attractive institution for both undergraduate and graduate students. SEE is working to recover the balance.

Ad poorly made

Editor,

In the words of Earnest Neville, "Sad, Sad, Sad!"

I was watching television the other night, and a commercial came on that almost made me urp. I thought the Pinata advertisements were bad, but this one even outdid the Boots Williams Ford ads. You know, the place at I-70 and Nolan road — next to Wild Woody's.

The ad I'm talking about is the "Stairway to Heaven" ad. It sounds like a theme for a high school prom. Not to mention, it's an insult to Led Zeppelin.

Is K-State really the stairway to heaven? I wonder if the great library in the sky is underfunded, among various other problems.

I thought the content of the commercial was hideous — except for the quick shot of K-State's two Rhodes Scholars. Congratulations again, ladies! Hey, how about the debate team? Isn't the debate team ranked first in the nation?

Why weren't the engineering or architecture departments or the veterinary medicine college shown, or at least talked about? I think K-State has more to offer than shots of the football team. I'm not bagging on the football team.

The ad gives no content of what K-State has to offer, except empty seats at a football game. Let Coach Snyder and his crew do their job. They don't need any more exposure than what they are getting.

Do you approve of this, President Wefald? If I were you, I would do something about it. The commercial makes the University look like crap! Now the University of Kansas and other schools have a legitimate reason to bag on us. K-State alumni who see the ad are probably too embarrassed to be associated with the University after seeing it. The ad makes the University look like hell. Wait, that gives me an idea. "K-State: The Highway to Hell."

Wait, I have an even better idea. Why don't you, or whoever is in charge of such promotions, utilize the students, faculty, and facilities of the University for a new K-State promotion. I'm sure other students would like to get in on the idea as well.

Wow! Imagine that — having your own students put what they have learned at this fine institution to work. Isn't utilizing what one has learned at college what college is all about?

Don't worry, we would put you in the ad, too. You could say, "I think K-State is the best college in Manhattan."

Bob Johnson
senior in radio and television

Dean apologizes

Editor,

Recently I accepted an invitation from Student Body President Todd Johnson to address the closing of classes in Arts and Sciences at a Student Senate meeting. I repeated an old joke from the college office about two faculty members dying and balancing the budget. I am told that some were offended by this joke and, if so, I apologize.

The incident was not without value in that it provided material for a serious editorial in the Collegian, a humorous one in the Manhattan Mercury and a few other articles and letters in local newspapers. More importantly it reminds us that officials of all kinds should expect the press to be ever watchful.

This is the way it should be. Thomas Jefferson said, "Were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers, or newspapers without a government, I should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter."

I agree with Jefferson.

Qualifications

Editor,

Student Senate voted last Thursday to approve my appointment as the chairperson of the Student Review Board. My approval was reconsidered after I had left the meeting. I am writing this letter to explain my qualifications.

I applied for the Student Tribunal but was selected for the Student Review Board. I received a letter from Todd Johnson notifying me of my selection and informing me of the Student Senate meeting. During the Senate meeting, I was put on the spot by Senator Travis Stumpff. I realize that the student senators, as representatives of the student body, have the right and obligation to ensure that the leaders of the University committees are capable of doing the job; however, it is generally the student body president and his attorney general who answer senators' questions about how they chose their appointees.

Senator Stumpff's insinuation that I received the appointment as a repayment for working on Todd Johnson's campaign for student body president is ludicrous. As a freshman transfer student, I had never heard of nor met Todd before my interview. Travis' questions about the duties I would have on this board and my qualifications for it are legitimate; however, because I was unprepared to speak in front of the entire Senate and felt new to all of this, I was nervous, on the spot and unable to effectively respond to his questions.

As I told the Senate, I have no experience in the judicial branch because of the small, private, Catholic school I attended for ten years. I realize there may be students who are better qualified than I am, but there are none who are more capable, more willing to learn, have the time to devote and express the interest in the position that I have. I know that by putting me as chairman, hopefully other students without previous experience will be spurred to get involved with student government without feeling they will be rejected. I felt intimidated about applying at all, but I wanted to get involved.

I don't want to say that experience should be ignored, but neither should interest and capabilities. I am able to lead the Student Review Board if I am given the chance.

Landlord responds

Editor,

In response to the editorial in Friday's Collegian on the proposed rental inspection program, the landlords are not against safety and health legislation. Landlords are against all other unnecessary aspects of this proposal that are not health- and safety-related caused by the inclusion of the BOCA standards.

The city commission should write and include standards that are reasonable and applicable to Manhattan rental property rather than try to save work by adopting standards from another state. BOCA standards were not written exclusively for rental property.

Most rental property in Manhattan would not meet the BOCA standards due to non-health- and non-safety-related infractions. These problem areas would have to be addressed individually, and variances may or may not be granted, depending on the discretion of a three-person panel.

Racism exists

Editor,

Bravo! Brad Seabourn, your editorial comment Feb. 8 was excellent and relevant to the situation at hand.

To begin with, let us pose some interesting questions. Does sexism exist on the K-State campus? Of course it does, hence the strong efforts spearheaded by President Wefald in trying to combat it. What about racism in general existing on campus and in Manhattan? Here in Manhattan, not only in Johannesburg, South Africa, racism is very much alive. It is not at all just "media hype" as some people claim.

Simple proofs: I have a son who worked in a restaurant in Aggieville for nearly three years, survived three changes of ownership and five different managements, but hardly ever got any raise above the minimum wage.

More so, from the first day we occupied an apartment in Jardine, my family has continually applied for an apartment with showers, but to my surprise, we never got one. Yet, there are people who applied after us who have gotten them.

In addition, KSU Housing has moved people around to new renovated houses with showers at least four times since we moved there, some three years ago. One then begins to wonder why our request is so illegible. We are now even tired of complaining.

Therefore, John Mussman and company, by trying to deny the existence of racism here, you are simply exacerbating it. A doctor who diagnoses cancer in a patient but fails to communicate the information properly fails in his duties. Likewise, let's face the problem head-on, before we count ourselves as failures. K-State administrators and students, churches, all schools, the Manhattan community and everybody must be involved in this battle. If we succeed, it shall be for the good of us all.

For these reasons, I thank Brad for uncoyering the myth of falsely denying the truth.

Henson, Jones lift 'Cats past Cyclones

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

AMES, Iowa — Iowa State freshman Justus Thigpen is probably still kicking himself.

K-State's Steve Henson is probably still pinching himself.

Meanwhile, Ski Jones still really doesn't know what exactly happened.

But the result of all the confusion was a big K-State road victory at Iowa State Saturday, 93-90, in overtime.

Thigpen's irritation at himself came from the two straight free throws he missed with :01 showing on the Hilton Coliseum scoreboard and the game tied at 79.

Henson's aura of confidence saw him, for the third straight year, score a career-high in the Cyclones' own building.

And Jones' three-pointer at the end of overtime was a prayer that was answered graciously.

The happenings after the intermission helped turn what was a boring game into an actually exciting contest.

Henson's performance had the Iowa State fans oohing and aahing. A Cyclone fan even yelled at Iowa State guard Terry Woods, "Get on that guy, Terry," but Woods gave the fan a nonchalant wave-off, as if he had it under control. But nobody would control Henson on this day.

After scoring nine points in the first half, he exploded in the final two periods, counting the overtime, and he ended up with his best-ever outing as a Wildcat, tallying 41 points on 15-of-24 shooting from the field.

The 41 points tied him with Mitch Richmond for the fifth-best single game total in Wildcat history.

The ironic twist was that when Woods most needed to stick with the K-State point guard, he did his job — to no avail, however.

With time running down in the overtime, and the game tied at 90, K-State was trying to work Henson free on the wing, but Henson couldn't brush Woods, and Jean Derouillere wound up stuck at the top of the key with the ball and no one to go to.

But, suddenly, Jones flashed up from the right side and took Derouillere's bounce pass in one motion and swished it for the victory.

"We were just trying to clear out for Steve, but he couldn't get open, and Jean just got the ball to me and I threw it up," Jones said. "It was all luck."

"I wanted to go get the ball, but I felt good about things when Jean had it too," Henson said. "I was just glad to see (Jones' shot) go in."

And he and the Wildcats were equally glad to see Thigpen's shots not go in.

Wildcats face big, big, big, big, big, big game Tuesday

David Svoboda

OFF THE BENCH

The NCAA men's basketball tournament isn't scheduled to begin until March 15, but a game played Tuesday in Bramlage Coliseum will have a tourney-like atmosphere.

When K-State and Oklahoma State take the court at 8 p.m., they'll be playing for an inside track at a fourth-place finish in the Big Eight.

But, my friends, this game means oh so much more than that.

At stake is a trip to the aforementioned big dance — the NCAA tourney. If the Wildcats win — or so the college basketball "experts" say — they need only win against Nebraska on March 3 in Bramlage to clinch their fourth consecutive trip to the round of 64.

If the Cowboys win — and they don't often meet with success on the road — they will make the K-State task extremely difficult.

If Oklahoma State comes into Manhattan and leaves with a win, the Wildcats will then have to go into Lawrence Saturday or Columbia, Mo., Feb. 28 and leave with a win.

Pardon me for saying so, but I think the 'Cats better get that first of two wins Tuesday. Taking No. 1 Kansas or No. 1-to-be Missouri on their home floors won't be easy.

Seventeen may or may not be the magic number for K-State, but I'm betting it will be, based on reputation alone.

To take a page from Mitch Holthus, the voice of the Wildcats, Tuesday's game is "big, big, big, big, big, big, big!"

Got the picture yet?

Each time the Wildcats have faced a must-win situation this season, they've responded in kind.

First was the home meeting with Oklahoma. K-State had been struggling prior to the contest, but a win against the then-No. 3 Sooners was big.

Next was the home meeting with Missouri. How 'bout a win over the then-No. 1 Tigers as an end to a three-game losing streak?

But as important as those two games may have been — and as important as Tuesday's game may be — the win over Iowa State Saturday in Ames may have been the biggest of the year.

First of all, it was the first Wildcat win on the road in conference play this year. Usual "gimme" games at Colorado and Nebraska went to the home teams.

But, thanks to never-say-die play, an unconscious performance by Steve Henson and a prayer by Askia Jones that was answered, K-State now controls its own destiny.

Coach Lon Kruger has maintained all along that this team has always controlled its own fate. And that's probably true. It just wasn't until the Iowa State game that the control looked firm.

"Road victories in the conference have been hard for everyone to come by," Kruger said matter-of-factly

Sunday night.

But, as Missouri showed at Kansas early last week, those teams that can win big games on the road in the conference quickly separate themselves from the rest of the pack.

That's what makes Tuesday's game with OSU so crucial. In a conference known possibly more than any other in the country for the importance of the home-court edge, K-State must take care of business against the Cowboys.

If Oklahoma State takes the win, they'll have done what Missouri and Oklahoma failed to do — leave the purple pit with a "W." That alone should be enough to lift them into the NCAA tourney field.

It's possible that OSU, with everything to gain and very little to lose, will be a bit more loose going into the contest.

That's where the veteran leadership of Henson, Lance Simmons, Tony Massop, Billy Ray Smith and Reggie Britt must come into play.

If the five seniors can respond with the kind of performances that they always have come crunch time, the Wildcats will get that win and take a huge step.

If they don't, it will be up to Jean Derouillere, Askia Jones and others to make sure K-State has a ticket to travel March 15.

It's a ticket the Wildcats want to pick up. It's a ticket they can make out themselves if they just seize the moment.

It's there for the taking.

Netters' road trip proves competitive

From Staff and Wire Reports

The K-State tennis team ended a grueling road trip Saturday by suffering its third straight setback in as many days, 9-0, at the University of Utah.

To begin the competitive three-match stretch, the K-State women dropped a 5-4 decision to Nevada-Las Vegas on Thursday, and then ran into No. 14 Brigham Young Friday, losing 7-2.

According to K-State coach Steve Bietau, playing BYU Friday took its toll on the K-State netters.

"We were very flat, and we're not a strong enough team to perform like that against that type of competition," Bietau said. "We were all disappointed in our performance, but the trip was good for us. We took several steps forward and accomplished several goals that we set for this trip."

Thursday Bietau had a few bright spots to talk about. "Despite the loss, we played a real competitive match," Bietau said. "We were down 4-1 at one point and made a good comeback."

I thought they dealt with some adverse conditions pretty well, and their attitude is good about where we stand at this point."

K-State, now 2-3 on the season, scored all of its points at the bottom of the lineup against UNLV.

Senior Helen Schildknecht, seeing her first action of the season, defeated Mary Jacobs 6-3, 6-2, in the No. 4 singles position. Schildknecht also teamed with Sara Hancock to post a 6-1, 6-3, victory over Debbie Higa and Jacobs at the No. 2 doubles slot.

Theresa Burcham also had a pair of wins, beating Madeleine Johnson 6-2, 6-3, in the No. 5 singles match, and she then teamed with freshman Suzanne Sim for a 6-2, 7-5, victory over Mary Laudenschlager and Teal Lane in the No. 3 doubles match.

Burcham was the only singles player to pick up a victory in the match against BYU. She defeated Sheri Yandle 7-6, 6-4, while Marjike Nel and Valerie Rive won the No. 1 doubles division with a 6-3, 6-4, victory over Monika Koblikova and Yandle.

Henson once more shines at Hilton

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

AMES, Iowa — There must be something about the lighting in Hilton Coliseum that makes Steve Henson virtually invincible.

Henson might even want to find out what kind of bulbs they put in the sockets at the home of the Iowa State Cyclones, because he obviously likes them.

For the third straight year, Henson had a career day in Hilton, as the Wildcats used the senior's 41-point performance, which included a school-record eight three-pointers, to down the Cyclones 93-90 in overtime.

"I don't know what it is," Henson said. "The shots were just there. I felt good warming up, and I just continued to get open shots."

"The guys did a good job of setting the picks, and the feeling just kept getting better and better."

Actually, Henson said, the feeling wasn't really all that strong early in the contest. He had just nine points at the half, and he was 4-of-9 from the field.

But, in the second half, Henson left the dressing room with an air of confidence surrounding him.

He didn't miss a shot until midway through the period and hit five straight from the field before that. The McPherson native had 32 points in the second half, including seven during overtime, and he ended the game 15-of-24 from the field.

"Steve had an outstanding performance," Wildcat coach Lon Kruger said. "In the second half he hit every big shot we had to have."

Perhaps Henson's biggest shot of the day was his three-pointer with 10 seconds left in regulation. After getting a big pick from Lance Simmons, Henson launched a shot from about 24 feet to tie the game at 79-79.

"I don't know if it was that far out," Henson said. "I just know that I saw big Vic (Iowa State's Alexander) coming at me."

Iowa State's Justus Thigpen could have ruined Henson's day, however. The freshman had a chance to win it at the line with one second left, but he missed two free throws, which were sandwiched between two K-State timeouts. Henson and the Wildcats had another chance at the victory.

From there, Henson rolled up his ■ See HENSON, Page 7

Lady Cats move game closer to league title

Tynnetta Rasheed attempts to block the path of Elyse Funk during the Lady Cats' 69-67 victory over Iowa State Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum. The Lady Cats can clinch a tie for the league title Wednesday.

Hazim nets 20 in women's victory

By David Svoboda

Now all that's left is a two-game dash to the conference championship.

The Lady Cats, overcoming yet another home halftime deficit, downed Iowa State 69-67 Saturday night in Bramlage Coliseum to move to within one win of clinching no worse than a tie for the Big Eight Conference regular season crown.

And if K-State can win Wednesday against Oklahoma State in Stillwater, Okla., and Saturday night in Bramlage against arch-rival Kansas, the Lady Cats will clinch their first undisputed conference title since 1983.

But first things first.

Iowa State entered Manhattan Saturday struggling to keep its head above water. The Cyclones had joined Nebraska and Oklahoma as one of three teams in the loop to be below the .500 mark in conference action.

But, as had Nebraska and Oklahoma in the previous two Lady Cat home contests, Iowa State made things much more difficult than interim coach Gaye Griffin and squad would have liked. Iowa State joined Nebraska in leading at the half in Bramlage before faltering down the stretch.

"We missed some easy shots right there in the beginning that resulted in some trouble," Griffin said of the opening minutes against Iowa State. "And they (the Cyclones) came out and played extremely hard."

Showing some of the fight Griffin spoke of, Iowa State moved out to their 36-30 halftime edge on the strength of 53.6 percent shooting from the field. The Cyclones were a perfect 4-of-4 from three-point range in the opening 20 minutes.

But in the second stanza K-State was much more active, and that spelled the difference, Griffin said.

"In the second half we came back out and played a lot more aggressively," she said.

Showing some of the added spark Griffin spoke of in the second half were the K-State post players, most notably Kristie Bahner. Bahner was limited to four first-half points, but had 11 in the final half.

"Our post players were doing a good job of moving, especially in the second half," Griffin said.

While Bahner was in her first-half scoring funk, Sheila Cherry gave the Lady Cats a boost from off the bench. Cherry scored five points in nine minutes of action in the first half.

It was the play of Cherry and a funk of another kind — guard Elyse — that gained Griffin's praise.

"Sheila Cherry just did a great job tonight," Griffin said. "Elyse Funk also came on and played some quality minutes, as did Amy Davidson."

Quietly overshadowed by the strong second half put together by Bahner was the second consecutive 20-point scoring night by Nadira Hazim. Hazim, who had 24 Wednesday against Oklahoma, had 20 against the Cyclones to lead all scorers.

Bahner with 15, Rita Matteucci with 13 and Diana Miller with 11 joined Hazim in double figures for K-State. Shelly Coyle had 18 to lead Iowa State.

K-State is now 18-7 overall and 10-2 in Big Eight play. Second-place Missouri, which won at Oklahoma State Saturday, is an identical 18-7 overall and is 9-3 in the conference. Oklahoma State is 15-9 overall and 8-4 in league play.

Owners won't budge

By The Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — Chuck O'Connor, management's chief negotiator in the baseball talks, said Sunday he had trouble convincing some owners to drop their revenue sharing and pay-for-performance proposals.

Commissioner Fay Vincent last week substituted the original proposals with a nine-point plan that calls for a 75 percent cap on salary increases in arbitration.

"If you're asking me, 'Did you have difficulty convincing some clubs on the PRC of it?' the answer to that is yes," O'Connor said. "We had lengthy discussions, morning and afternoon conference calls ... but we were able to emerge with a consensus that this was the way we're going to go."

O'Connor and players association head Donald Fehr spoke Sunday during a forum on baseball collective bargaining at a meeting of the Associated Press Sports Editors. Fehr was in Tampa and O'Connor participated from New York by telephone hookup.

As the lockout enters its fifth day, negotiations resume in New York with two sessions on Monday. The morning is scheduled to be devoted to non-economic issues and the afternoon to the central areas of contention.

Sunday's meeting with reporters was unusual in that Fehr and O'Connor spoke jointly for 30 minutes and had the opportunity to rebut statements. After negotiating sessions, the two hold separate briefings.

O'Connor said Vincent's proposals resulted from discussions that followed the owners meeting on Feb. 9 outside Chicago.

"We spent the better part of Saturday and Sunday looking at where we were," O'Connor said, "looking at what Fay has identified as one of his principal concerns."

'Cats nip Hogs in final game, prevent opening-series sweep

From Staff and Wire Reports

L.J. Twynier's second double of the game sparked a four-run, ninth-inning rally to lift K-State to a 5-4 win over the ninth-ranked Arkansas Razorbacks Sunday afternoon in Fayetteville, Ark.

The Razorbacks won the opening two games of the series Saturday to take the three-game weekend set 2-1.

Sunday's ninth-inning rally allowed the Wildcats to regain control of the game after Arkansas took a 2-1 lead in the seventh inning and threatened to sweep.

K-State held an early 1-0 advantage before Arkansas put two tallies on the board in the seventh. The Razorback rally offset a strong pitching performance by Wildcat starter Chris Hmielewski.

Hmielewski went 6 1/2 innings and allowed only four hits. He struck out six and walked three, allowing only one earned run — in the seventh.

Prior to the Arkansas uprising in the seventh, the Razorbacks did not have a runner reach second base.

In addition to his brilliance on the hill, Hmielewski had two hits — including a double — to help Twynier pace the Wildcat attack. Aside from Twynier's two-run double in the ninth, shortstop Craig Wilson added a two-run single in the four-run frame.

Arkansas did not go quietly, putting two runs on the board in the bottom of the ninth before Steve Scoville picked up the save in relief of Dave Christensen, who came on in relief of Hmielewski in the seventh.

In the series-opening doubleheader Saturday, Arkansas used a pair of strong pitching performances to get the sweep.

The Hogs won a nailbiter in the opener, claiming a 2-1 win. Arkansas used a three-run fifth to break open a tight game in the nightcap, going on to win, 5-1.

Doug Bennett pitched the second game for Arkansas and recorded 10 strikeouts while only allowing three K-State hits.

David Hierholzer was the tough-luck loser for K-State in game one, allowing only four hits. The game-winning triple by Arkansas' Greg D'Alejandro came on a Texas leaguer that bounced away from the Wildcat outfielders.

Hierholzer struck out six and walked four in the seven-inning game.

K-State managed but five hits in the opener off winner Rob Dodd. Dodd benefited from three double plays in shutting down the Wildcat attack.

The lone K-State run in the opener came on a solo homer by designated hitter Kevin Kaufman.

Kaufman was the only K-State player to record more than one hit in the twinbill, with two singles to go with the homer.

Freshman Sean Pedersen faced Bennett in the second game Saturday, allowing eight hits and four earned runs in four innings of work. He walked one and had one strikeout.

The series marked the first action of the year for K-State, 1-2. The Sunday loss was the first of the young season for Arkansas, 3-1.

All the freshman had to do was hit one of his two free throws after Lance Simmons fouled him with time running down in regulation. But the pressure may have been too much to ask of anybody — and the Wildcats didn't help matters by calling two time outs during Thigpen's attempts to seal the Cyclone victory.

"There wasn't much we could do," K-State coach Lon Kruger said of waiting to see if Thigpen would hit the charities. "You hate to see it happen to a young man, but we were glad to get another chance at it."

Henson's 41 points, Jones' basket and Thigpen's botched free-throw attempts took most of the limelight, but overshadowed were some other outstanding individual performances.

K-State's Jean Derouillere netted 21 points, while Woods had 20, Iowa State reserve Kurt Baker had 24 and Victor Alexander tallied 22.

K-State, 15-11 and 5-5, now awaits what looms as a very important game for the Wildcats with fourth place riding on Tuesday night's matchup with Oklahoma State in Bramlage Coliseum.

just glad it wasn't wasted in defeat. If it had, it wouldn't have meant that much to him."

That is probably true. Even Henson, as usual, found some fault with his performance.

numbers in the overtime, and his final bucket at the 49-second mark gave him the K-State mark for three-pointers in a game, breaking Will Scott's record of seven, which came in the 1988 NCAA tourney against DePaul.

When Henson was a sophomore, he hit for 24 points and a Coliseum record 17-straight free throws in a K-State win. He then connected for 33 points in a loss to the Cyclones last year, but those games paled beside Saturday's performance.

Tracksters prep for Big 8

By The Collegian Staff

With the Big Eight Championships just around the corner, Coach John Capriotti was looking for tune-up performances in the KSU Open Saturday at Ahearn Field House, and that is exactly what he got.

K-State turned in some impressive marks and showed the improvement Capriotti was looking for to be ready for the conference meet Friday and Saturday at Lincoln, Neb.

"It was a really good meet," Capriotti said. "We accomplished what we wanted."

Capriotti held several athletes from this meet so they could rest, and most of the other athletes competed in fewer or different events to prepare themselves for the level of competition they will face in Lincoln.

Yet, with many of the athletes not competing, Capriotti saw some strong performances that he said prove the team is ready for the conference meet.

"The athletes seem ready to compete. When you get (personal records) at the end of the season you're doing the right things," Capriotti said. "I saw a lot of that, so I'm really happy."

On the women's side, K-State began the meet with Paulette Staats, Janet Treiber, Angie Barry and Becky Ives running away from the competition in the 3,200 meter relay to capture the title.

"They were doing that for a workout. They did a good job and turned in some good splits," Capriotti said.

The women also had good performances by Janet Haskin and Jennifer Hillier, who both set personal records in the mile to nab second and fifth.

Karen McGaughey jumped to second place in the long jump. Angie Miller met the national qualifying standard again to capture the shot put title. Connie Teaberry showed another fine performance in the high jump to get third.

Ellarie Pesmark and Laura Ostmeyer got second and third in the 600-yard run, and Markeya Jones captured second in the 200 meters only .5 seconds behind Stacey Clark of Oklahoma State, who set an Ahearn Field House record.

In men's competition, Charles Armstead had a fine performance in the 55-meter hurdles, as did Antoine Dulan, with the two finishing first and second for the 'Cats. Armstead was the only double winner in Saturday's meet, capturing the long jump title, and teammate Clifton Etheridge followed him by capturing the silver.

Tyrone Watkins was the sole K-State athlete to set a record at the meet when he won the 600-yard dash in 1:10.6 to break the Ahearn Field House mark. Dwayne Murphy continued K-State's strong triple jump performances by placing third, and the mile relay team finished in third place as well.

Karen McGaughey successfully completed this attempt at 5-1 1/2 to finish in eighth place at the KSU Open indoor track meet Saturday.

'Buster' to defend title belt against Holyfield in September

By The Associated Press

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Evander Holyfield will meet heavyweight champion James "Buster" Douglas in the fall, forcing Mike Tyson to wait a year for a rematch with the man who took his title, Douglas' manager said Sunday.

Holyfield, the top-ranked challenger, and Douglas will fight in September under an agreement manager John Johnson said he reached Saturday with Holyfield's manager, Dan Duva.

"Right now, we're planning for Holyfield in September," Johnson said. "It looks like (a rematch with) Tyson will be next February."

Johnson said financial terms for the Holyfield fight have not been finalized, but said Douglas would earn

"many times the $1.3 million" he was paid for his 10th-round knockout over Tyson at Tokyo on Feb. 10.

In an interview on NBC-TV Sunday, Johnson said one factor in the decision to fight Holyfield was the lack of respect Tyson and promoter Don King showed toward Douglas after their fight.

"Don King had tried, and for a very short time, successfully kept James Douglas from being the heavyweight champion of the world," Johnson said. "James Douglas didn't get the true glory and all the things he should have gotten after that fight because of Don King's actions."

"We're going to go with James Douglas' wishes not to have anything to do with Don King, and I agree with that, but we're going to be more than fair with Don King."

King could not be immediately reached for comment. A telephone message for him at Don King Productions in New York was not immediately returned.

Douglas and Johnson also rejected a suggestion that by fighting Holyfield, who is undefeated in 23 fights and rated by oddsmakers as a 2-1 favorite for the September bout, they were jeopardizing Douglas' chance of retaining his title for a rematch with Tyson.

"I don't put any stock in the odds," Douglas said. "I know how I feel and the outcome will be another shocker."

"I wanted to accept a challenge and be a true champion. He's the No. 1 contender, and that's all I can do."

Students receive two-thirds for books

By The Collegian Staff

Students wondering how much money they will have at the end of the semester can calculate that the price they get for used textbooks is generally about two-thirds of what they paid for them.

The K-State Union Bookstore and Varney's Bookstore sell used books at 75 percent of the publisher's suggested retail price for a new book, said Kay Farley, Union bookstore manager, and Dan Walter, Varney's textbook manager.

Walter said Varney's pays 50 percent of the suggested retail price of a new book when they buy back a used book.

Farley said the Union pays 50 percent cash for used books and gives a 60 percent credit to Wildcat cards, the declining-balance cards students can use for purchases in the Union.

"Every book we buy back is an investment," Walter said.

Walter said it is his job to decide how to make the most of that investment. He said the choice is either to keep the book at the store to sell again in the near future or sell the book to a used-book wholesaler.

Walter said the best decision for the store is to keep the books for resale rather than sell them to a wholesaler. Keeping a book for resale can be risky, especially books used in classes offered once every three semesters, since new editions come out on an average of every three years. In such cases, the store is out the money they paid for the books, he said.

Students holding textbooks scheduled for new editions will be offered nothing, Walter said.

Orchestra 'embodies' music

Laura Scroggins

REVIEW

The sounds of the New Flint Hills Chamber Orchestra's performance of Rossini's "Sonata No. 1 in G Major" led listeners on a wild trip of happy and loathsome thoughts Saturday night.

That journey stems from the way the technically superb, mainly 12-piece chamber orchestra embodied the pieces they presented to an audience of about 200 in All Faiths Chapel.

In addition to the Sonata by Rossini, the orchestra completed the bill with four additional works. Those pieces included compositions by Corelli, Grieg and, in a non-traditional twist, Scott Joplin.

The orchestra's performance not only concentrated on the technical aspects but captured the mood of the music as well. Discerning ears, hoping to find mistakes, would only miss out on a wonderful, musical adventure.

The second piece, entitled "St. Paul's Suite," by Holst was one of five movements. It contained a brief Ostinato characterized by a light, airy melody and supplemented by frequent plucking of the strings.

The Intermezzo movement of the piece was a tricky one with difficult timing. It seemed to require perfect unity, which the group displayed. Throughout the Intermezzo and the Finale, the chamber orchestra not only mastered the feeling of the piece but filled it with their own enjoyment of performance.

The group went on to finish the evening with the two last scheduled pieces: "The Concerto Grosso in C Major" by Corelli and the "Holberg Suite" by Grieg.

The Corelli concerto was a bouncy, joyous piece consisting of six movements. The suite by Grieg was a work of similar depth, but a more subdued tone.

In a surprise ending, the orchestra announced an additional piece would be performed.

"Paragon Rag," by Scott Joplin was a lively ragtime piece that not only displayed a difference in musical performance ability, but saved some audience members from "sawing Z's" in their seats.

While the ragtime rhythm eluded the members and their technically trained fingers, in comparison to the two previously scheduled selections, the piece was a welcome change.

The orchestra consisted of students, faculty members and alumni, with one exception: first violinist Kristin Mortenson, a former Louisiana native, who lives and teaches in Manhattan. The thirteenth member of the group, Continuo Organist Mary Ann Littrell, joined the orchestra for one piece as an accompanist.

Appointees learn judiciary system

By Elvyn Jones
Collegian Reporter

Students newly appointed to the judicial system were acquainted with their duties and responsibilities in dealing with non-academic misconduct at a seminar Sunday in the K-State Union.

Rob Dieringer, senior in construction science and attorney general, said the judicial system consists of residence hall judicial boards and the Student Review Board. The residence hall boards hear cases of violations of student conduct codes and individual residence hall rules, and the Student Review Board hears cases of violations of the student conduct code on campus or at University-sponsored events. Appeals of these bodies can be made to the Student Tribunal, Dieringer said.

Judicial Council supervises the administration of the judicial system. This body, administered by the attorney general, also reviews cases appealed to the Student Tribunal, he said.

A final appeal in all cases can be made to President Jon Wefald, Dieringer said.

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities and adviser to the judicial system, said although formal responsibility for the enforcement of student conduct codes and discipline belongs to the administration, it has been delegated to students. Students have gained the administration's confidence during the more than 20 years they have been responsible for the judicial system, she said.

Routson stressed the need for judicial members to be confidential, objective and fair. She also said members should try to be creative in dealing with punishment and focus on the growth and development of the student.

Curtis Munk, sophomore in business administration and chief justice of Goodnow Hall, said his board tries to be creative by sentencing offenders to behavior contracts, special duties, drug and alcohol treatment, and room or floor changes.

Robert Burgess, assistant director of housing, said judicial members should remember a sense of community in dealing with residence hall cases. It is important to remember community rights and how individual actions might influence the community as a whole, he said.

Routson said the Student Review Board is not as active as the residence hall boards because complaints tend to come from residential settings.

The police often get involved in on-campus disputes that are brought to the Student Review Board, Routson said. In these cases, the University decides on discipline matters independent of any decision by the city attorney to prosecute, she said.

Routson encouraged the members to attend a training session on sexual violence, which is mandatory for anyone serving on the Sexual Violence Board.

The numbers are restricted because of the sensitivity of the cases, Routson said.

Area renamed Union Station

Former Catskeller receives new name in wake of becoming non-alcoholic bar

By Todd Ubben
Collegian Reporter

The Catskeller, a study area in the K-State Union that is being converted to a non-alcoholic bar, has a new name. It will be known as the Union Station.

Jennifer Wiles, senior in elementary education, won $100 by submitting the winning entry in a contest to name the bar. Entries were submitted last semester.

Wiles said she heard about the contest during the Activities Carnival in September, and a friend talked her into entering. She said she plans to use the prize money for a trip to Florida during spring break.

Out of 30 entries, two other names, Catskeller and Willieville, made it into the final selection process, said Mike Ribble, program adviser for Union Program Council.

Rules stipulated that a drawing be held in the case of two people submitting the same winning entry. Two people submitted the name Catskeller, Ribble said.

Only one entry was allowed per person, and applications had to be from students, faculty or staff. Ribble said the contest was designed to make students feel they had some control over the area.

"It was kind of a group decision that we should not just pick a name and then put it on the students," Ribble said. "We wanted to have a student choose the name."

A special subcommittee of students and faculty judged the names. The judges looked for a catchy name that would reflect both the University and the Union and that would also be good for promoting the bar, Ribble said.

He said the original first prize was $50 and free admission to any organized event at the bar. An executive decision was made to increase the prize money and omit the free admission, however, because Wiles will be doing her student teaching off-campus next semester.

Minor construction, including refinishing chairs and tables, has been completed, Ribble said. Construction should be completed by early June.

"We're hoping that by spring break, we should have a construction company in here," he said.

Union Station is scheduled to be opened for new student enrollment June 8, and the grand opening will be in August.

"We want to hit all the new incoming freshmen and kind of show off this new space," Ribble said.

Ribble said he has heard some complaints from students that their study space is being taken. However, students will be able to study in the bar during the day.

"I have a feeling it will be somewhat similar to the Stateroom, kind of an area where there's noise going on but people tend to study anyway," he said.

Ribble said the bar will serve a multi-faceted function as a study area, meeting area and a place to watch television. Union Station will be open to anyone during the day, but it will primarily serve college students during the evening.

"We really don't want it to become a high-school hangout," he said. "A lot of people have a negative connotation of non-alcoholic bars, because too many high-school students get into them."

Student IDs will be accepted from any college in the area, and one guest will be allowed per student, Ribble said. Customers will generally not have to pay a cover charge. Bands, comedians and other special events will require an admission charge, he said.

"We're gearing it toward students, so we're doing everything we can to keep the price down," Ribble said.

Students will be able to purchase deli sandwiches, bottled water, sodas, non-alcoholic ice cream drinks, and possibly even non-alcoholic wines and beers.

McCain presents 'Wind in the Willows'

By Angela Tholstrup
Collegian Reporter

You have a chance to see a mole, a rat, a toad and a badger on stage Tuesday.

"Wind in the Willows," an adaptation of the imaginative classic, will be presented on at 7 p.m. Tuesday in McCain Auditorium.

"It is something an adult could go see and enjoy," said Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium. "It's not infantile, though it is pitched at a younger audience."

Stage One, the Louisville Children's Theatre, will perform the family oriented play, Martin said.

Kenneth Grahame began by telling his son adventure tales, and they grew into the novel, Martin said. The presentation is a story about the friendship of a group of animals living along a river bank in England.

The animals have been said to represent social classes or political systems, Martin said.

The toad is a gentleman who lives in Toad Hall. He becomes infatuated with cars, which leads him to misadventures.

His friends are Mole, Rat, Badger and Otter.

Stage One uses costumes to help visualize the characters, Martin said. Toad has many warts, and Rat has large incisors. Badger has protruding teeth and a stripe down his back.

"The actors do not wear costumes to disguise the fact they are people," Martin said. "Even though Toad is a character, he is obviously (a person) made up to be a toad."

Stage One was the hit of the Performing Arts Imagination Celebration at John F. Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C., in 1988, Martin said.

The company has performed the well known children's plays "Charlotte's Web," "Winnie the Pooh," "Velveten Rabbit" and "The Diary of Anne Frank."

In 1988, the company achieved international acclaim by performing in the world premiere in Moscow of "On the Edge," A play written by a Soviet.

Martin said tickets are still available.

Prints featured regional artists

Friends of Art sponsors retrospective exhibit showing historical chronology

Jim Rourke

REVIEW

The K-State Friends of Art featured a retrospective exhibit in Holton Hall Sunday afternoon.

The exhibit consisted of 28 gift prints all from regional artists. The exhibit was Friends of Art prints from 1934 to the present.

The "Early Settlers House," by John F. Helm, Jr. (1934) started the exhibit. This print was light with simplicity being its strongest point. It was a strong contrast to the "Woodside Hut," by Herschel C. Logan (1935). The Logan was very dark, perhaps the darkest print of the Friends collection.

The exhibit was displayed chronologically with the pieces from several years missing.

Most of the prints are black and white. The 1954 print "Wild Sunflower," is a vividly yellow print that stood out from the other prints in the exhibit. This piece by W. and S. Schmidt should be honored as a cornerstone piece of this exhibit.

The "Winter Landscape," by Oscar Larmer (1957) was a brown tone print that was not of inspiring subject but was thought-provoking and technically sharp.

The 1968 print "House at Silverton" by Lloyd Foltz, was another thought-provoking piece that bought to mind the solitude of the hills. Overall this Friends of Art Gift Print collection is one of the finest collection of prints I have had the pleasure of contemplating. The University should get this set of prints out on the road and touring to national art museums.

The Friends of Art organization has left an incredible print legacy of national caliber and it would be in the University's best interest to share this with the nation.

Mandy Doolittle, assistant curator of art, is now working with the Friends.

James Munce, professor of art, was the featured artist at the exhibit. Members who have joined at the $150 and $500 level received a signed limited edition gift print of Munce's artwork.

Ruth Ann Wefald said the Friends of Art used to give new members gift prints but stopped five or six years ago and are now trying to restore that idea.

"We're just trying to rejuvenate the organization and get this big one under our belt," Wefald said.

The membership drive seems to be succeeding. More than $12,000 has been raised, she said.

"It's going very well and we hope it continues," Wefald said.

The money raised from the drive will benefit the University's art collection. The money is used to enhance the art collection, sponsor lectures, maintain the art and help to bring art shows to the campus.

Doolittle said the art collection can benefit the University in various ways. To her, it's important that people see and enjoy the wonderful artwork.

Having a museum on campus is another important aspect to the Friends of Art organization. Wefald said Friends of Art will be a primary source in getting the museum built.

The proposed museum is part of the $100 million Essential Edge Campaign, of which the museum would receive $5 million.

"The EEC is a 5-year campaign but my hope is that it will happen before that," Wefald said.

"I believe a museum would benefit all of Manhattan and Friends of Art will play an integral part in establishing a museum," Doolittle said.

Information about the Friends of Art may be obtained by calling the Art Department at 532-6605. Tammy Rose contributed information to this review.

Fort unaffected by unit plans

By Elvyn Jones
Collegian Reporter

The recent announcement by Sen. Nancy Kassebaum that the forward brigade of the First Infantry Division in Germany will not be stationed at Fort Riley will not effect the need for expansion of the Fort.

Mark Meseke, media relations officer at Fort Riley, said the need for expansion was necessitated by the number of existing troops stationed at the installation, not plans to station additional troops there.

The two remaining brigades of the First Division stationed at the Fort are still committed to defend Europe by treaty obligation with NATO and will continue training to fulfill that mission, Meseke said.

Army officials have determined that 82,500 contiguous acres are required to carry out battalion-size maneuvers, and the Fort currently has only 7,000 contiguous acres available, Meseke said.

An Analysis of Alternatives Study ordered by the Congressional Accounting Office will be contracted within the next two months, Meseke said. The study will recommend the expansion of the Fort, the use of simulators to reduce the need for land in training or the movement of Fort Riley personnel to such facilities as Fort Irwin, Calif. or Fort Carson, Colo. for maneuvers, he said.

Part of the study will be a survey by the Corps of Engineers Research Laboratory to determine the best area for the Fort to expand, if that is determined to be necessary, Meseke said.

The Alternatives Study recommendations will be released near the end of 1990, he said.

The chairman of Preserve the Flint Hills, Keith Ascher, of rural Geary County, said he is confident the study will find alternatives to the expansion of Fort Riley. He also thinks the new political climate in Central Europe will have an impact on the needs of the Army.

"What they needed a year ago, they might not need now," Ascher said.

He said Kassebaum's announcement that there will not be additional troops stationed at the Fort from Germany eliminates further pressure for expansion.

Ascher said although his group continues to lobby legislators in efforts to oppose expansion, it is moving more to local community efforts.

These efforts are being aimed at local business people who have fears about the future of Fort Riley, Ascher said. It is important to prevent expansion from becoming an urban versus rural issue, he said.

Randy Martin, president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said his organization neither opposes nor supports expansion at this time. The Chamber is concerned about the continued economic impact on the area by Fort Riley, he said.

If further study indicates the need for the expansion of the Fort to fulfill its mission, the Chamber would support that expansion, he said.

Panel discusses admissions bill

By Anne Krauss
Collegian Reporter

The House Appropriations Committee heard testimony last week on a bill that would stipulate admissions requirements at Kansas Board of Regents institutions. A similar bill died in the house last year.

Rep. Katha Hurt, D-Manhattan, said she did not see the bill as being too concrete.

"Right now I don't see a need for it," Hurt said. "The bill is so general — it's a laughing stock."

The bill would require students to complete four units of English, three units of mathematics, three units of social studies, three units of natural science and two units of a foreign language in high school. They would also have to graduate with at least a 2.0 grade point average.

Despite the discussions on the qualified admissions bill, debate may not be what determines the outcome of the issue, according to a recent Senate Ways and Means Subcommittee report. The legislature's action on funding of requested enrollment adjustments may instead be the deciding factor.

The report on systemwide issues for regents schools says the abolishment of the enrollment adjustment process could encourage qualified admissions through budgetary constraints.

"The problem surfacing this year is money that is theirs is being withheld," Hurt said.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-

Manhattan, agreed that qualified admissions shouldn't be accepted as a means of reconciling institutions' budgets.

"We shouldn't have qualified admissions by fiat," Hochhauser said. "That's not an honest way to get the policy."

Two bills have been introduced to the House that would restore funding of enrollment adjustments to the state's budget.

Supporters of qualified admissions say it would save institutions money by lowering the cost of remedial instruction and increase students' chances for academic success.

The state spent $531,000 on remedial courses in fiscal year 1989, but Hochhauser said she doesn't think this will have much of an effect on institutions' budgets.

"I don't see any fiscal savings with a qualified admissions plan," Hochhauser said. "The cost of remedial courses was not significant."

Hurt said her experience as an elementary school teacher has made her more sympathetic to the plight of the average student.

"Perhaps my disposition is colored by seeing a student pouring his heart out and still getting an average grade," she said. "Denying an education to those students worries me."

She said grades can be a poor indication of a student's effort or desire for an education.

The Associated Press contributed to this story.

Group offers homosexuals fellowship

By Julie Andsager
Features Editor

"Yes, there are homosexuals in Manhattan, Kansas."

Fliers with this message appear on bulletin boards around campus to advertise K-State's Gay and Lesbian Resource Center. The fliers are posted to let interested people know the times and dates of upcoming GLRC events.

Unlike fliers for other organizations, however, no meeting place is listed for the events.

Kent Donovan, GLRC adviser, said the reason for the omission is not so much to prevent harassment as to encourage attendance.

Lydia, GLRC president and K-State senior, said new members might be hesitant about attending events if they think other people might find out they are gay. She asked to have her last name withheld.

"When you first realize you're gay, you go through a paranoia stage," Lydia said.

GLRC is a social organization, not a counseling center, Donovan said.

"For the most part, the resource GLRC offers is really fellowship," Donovan said. "It's an opportunity to meet men and women of various ages who are gay or lesbian. Some younger members get advice from older members."

The GLRC is open to K-State students, staff and faculty and Manhattan residents, Donovan said. It has no membership list, also to encourage membership. Lydia said the average bi-weekly meeting draws about 20 people.

These numbers do not reflect the size of the gay community in Manhattan, Lydia said. Many gays and lesbians have not yet openly admitted their sexuality because they are frightened of societal pressure, she said.

"(Sociologists) say one out of every 10 people in the world is gay, which means for a long time a lot of people have been very unhappy,"

Lydia said. "That's one facet of our organization — to make those people more comfortable with their sexuality."

Organizations such as GLRC provide an alternative to gay bars, Donovan said. Manhattan does not have any gay bars, he said, but Topeka has two. Wichita has six or seven, and Kansas City has 15-20.

"One of the difficulties gay men and women have, even in fairly tolerant climates such as we have in the United States, is finding places to meet one another," Donovan said.

The current GLRC is the fourth such organization to exist on campus, Donovan said. It has existed about seven years. The first gay organization at K-State started in the 1960s when gay liberation came about, he said.

"University administrators, faculty and staff have been, at the very least, tolerant and at best, encouraging," Donovan said. "GLRC has had a lot of support from University spokesmen.

"The community as a whole — not only the University, but students and townspeople — are either indifferent or tolerant," he said.

As GLRC adviser, Donovan said he has received little harassment, and it has been almost entirely limited to telephone calls. He estimated he gets one or two harassing calls a year. Most come from drunken male undergraduates or frustrated homosexuals, he said.

"I've had a couple of calls from young men who I've decided are gay from what they've said," Donovan said.

An off-campus gay and lesbian empowerment group, unrelated to GLRC, will be formed at the end of February, said Eunice Dorst, co-owner of the Kindred Spirit Book Store.

table. They lifted the loaf, rolling it over, examining its sides and top. Unruh asked the judges not to cut the loaf for a few minutes until it was fully cooled. The judges obliged, discussing the recipe and the loaf's appearance.

But at one o'clock, the slicing began.

For the next hour and 15 minutes, the contestants, their husbands, parents and children and members of the sponsoring organizations waited.

Steve Graham, administrator of the Kansas Wheat Commission, was among those waiting. He said he felt the contest met its goals of having a wide variety in contestant age, attracting many contestants and having men become involved. Graham said about a dozen men competed.

"We've worked hard to include men in this competition," said Sharon Davis, nutritionist for the wheat commission.

The contestants' travel and lodging expenses were paid by the event's main sponsors — the wheat commission, the Kansas State Board of Agriculture, the Kansas Association of Wheat Growers and the Kansas Wheathearts, wives of wheat growers.

The judges returned as the carts were wheeled back, the cut loaves sitting on breadboards. Remarks were made by the judges about improving the form of the recipes and about the loaves themselves.

"There wasn't a bad one in the bunch," Chambers said to the anxious audience.

Each of the runners-up was handed a check for $100, their prize for competing. The field for a champion bread baker, who would receive $500, narrowed to four, then three, then two, and then to Viola Unruh.

"This has really been great," Unruh said.

Unruh passed out pieces of her loaf to the audience afterward.

"If I'd known I was going to win I'd have brought some jelly and butter," she said.

Heitschmidt said, "I would have followed through with the deal if my Faculty Senate position wasn't in jeopardy."

Heitschmidt said there were other reasons behind Johnson's decision besides not resigning his Senate seat.

"He found out I'm not a person who'll jump when he tells me to," Heitschmidt said. "He wants people who are going to do exactly what he says — yes-men."

"Todd and I have some differences," he said. "But if that makes me his enemy, then I surrender."

"Farisani's visit renewed our awareness of the injustice of the apartheid system," said Don Fallon, University religious activities coordinator. "I think he communicated very articulately with students and faculty as a warm and caring person. I have a deep appreciation for his coming to the Manhattan community."

"We do have a very broad-based group," Johnson said.

Besides the Tribunal appointments, Johnson said he will try to find another candidate for Associated Students of Kansas campus director after he withdrew the appointment of Todd Heitschmidt, senior in agricultural economics.

Johnson said the appointment was withdrawn because Heitschmidt wouldn't resign his Senate seat before he took the ASK position, a move that was agreed to by both parties.

"That was the agreement that we had reached," Johnson said. "I want ASK to be their primary focus. It's a paid position, Senate isn't."

Johnson had agreed that Heitschmidt could retain his position as student representative to Faculty Senate, but Heitschmidt learned that it was unconstitutional to keep the position while not a member of Student Senate.

"I didn't find out for sure until Thursday afternoon before the Senate meeting," Heitschmidt said. "I

House to debate admissions bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A House committee endorsed a bill Monday to end the longstanding state policy of allowing all Kansas high school graduates to enroll in a state university.

As approved by the House Appropriations Committee, the bill establishes several tests for determining whether a student would be admitted to one of the six state Board of Regents universities. It also allows those universities to make exceptions for a certain number of students.

The new requirements would affect freshmen entering college in the fall of 1994, a provision supporters said would give ample time to them and high schools to prepare for the new requirement. Detractors said the measure would prevent some underprivileged students from getting to college.

The committee endorsed the bill on an unrecorded vote with 14 of its 23 members indicating their support. The measure now goes to the House for debate.

"It does not prevent anybody from going to college," said Rep. Rochelle Chronister, R-Neodesha. "I say you will be ready for college."

Much of the debate on the bill centered on its possible effects. Supporters contend it is a "qualified" admissions bill, meaning students will be forced to take the high school courses needed to qualify for admission.

Opponents said it will have the effect of keeping some students out of college.

"The whole idea is wrong," said Rep. Ken Francisco, D-Wichita. "Closing the doors of education is wrong."

Under the bill, Kansas high school graduates under the age of 21 would have to meet one of three standards. They would have to have a 2.0 grade point average

Stereotypes seldom accurate

More similarities apparent than differences for homosexuals

Gay Life In MANHATTAN

Editor's note: This is the second in a series about gays in Manhattan.

By Julie Andsager
Features Editor

Stereotypic images of homosexuals — limp-wristed, effeminate men and masculine women with low voices — are seldom accurate.

"Most of the time you would never know who was gay in a group and who was not," said Eunice Dorst, co-owner of the Kindred Spirit Book Store.

Kent Donovan, adviser for the Gay and Lesbian Resource Center, said there are many more similarities between homosexuals and heterosexuals than there are differences.

Another person's sexual preference is not always any more apparent to a gay person than to a straight person, said Lydia, a K-State senior and GLRC president. She asked to have her last name withheld.

"If a woman was straight, she probably wouldn't even notice if a woman was attracted to her, and the lesbian would back off immediately," Dorst said. "It almost happens in a flash. It's not even a question of backing off, because nothing overt has happened."

Chris, a K-State junior who asked to have his last name withheld, said a gay man's sexual preference is not always obvious.

"If you look at me, I don't talk gay, I don't look gay, I don't move gay," Chris said.

Gay men and lesbians often learn their sexual preference in adolescence, Donovan said.

"Even with taboos, we have to assume high school kids and even junior high kids will start experimenting," Donovan said.

Lydia had dated men for several years before discovering she was a lesbian, she said. Lydia's late biological mother was gay. Although homosexuality has not been proven hereditary, Lydia said the fact her mother was a lesbian made her more open-minded about homosexuality.

"I always thought I had a choice, and I was straight," Lydia said. "Then I met my lover, whom I have been with for two years, and I realized."

Chris learned he was gay when he was a high school freshman.

"I'd never really felt anything for men or women, and I thought, 'You know, I might be (gay),' and it turned out I was," Chris said.

"I'm one of the 2 or 4 percent of homosexuals who have no attraction toward women whatsoever," Chris said. "Most gay men I know have a partial attraction to women but a much stronger one toward men."

Dorst and Lydia each said a lesbian relationship is not really much different than a heterosexual one. Both have been involved in heterosexual relationships. Lesbians, however, can understand each other in a way that men and women cannot, Dorst said.

"Women's experiences are different than men's, and that is something lesbians share," Dorst said.

"I can get closer to a woman than I can ever get to a man because of our experiences," Lydia said.

Lydia said she and her lover are no different than other, heterosexual couples. They enjoy going to movies and parties, or sometimes they stay in at night and rent movies.

Because society is not yet completely tolerant of homosexuality, Chris said, it is sometimes difficult for gay men to have relationships. He said he had an experience with a man who decided to end their relationship instead of dealing with the societal pressure that comes with being identified as gay.

A male professor, who asked to remain anonymous, said society has made homosexuality into a sort of subculture.

"It's a trip to be gay," the professor said. "It's like belonging to a secret club. It's not all secret anymore, but it's like a secret society. I look at things differently than other people do. It's like visiting a foreign country where the people are friendly."

Lydia said her gay and lesbian

Student Body President Todd Johnson joins other students from around the state in a human chain around the Capitol. The chain was used to express support for higher education.

Students rally at Capitol, support higher education

By Tammy Rose
Collegian Reporter

More than 250 college students gathered on the steps of the capitol Monday to express their support for higher education.

The rally was part of the Associated Students of Kansas Lobby Day for government support of higher education. Bill Mosely, vice-chairman of the ASK board and a junior at the University of Kansas, said the rally was in support of higher education and the maintenance of a base budget. The regents' request for a base budget is $601.3 million and the governor's recommendation is $592.7 million.

Sen. Michael Johnston, D-Parsons, started off the rally with a speech encouraging students to get involved and stay involved.

"Keep yourself involved, that is my message to you today," Johnston said.

He said it was not likely that the Margin of Excellence program would receive its third year of funding due to the state's lack of money, but assured students to not give up hope.

"Work with us, give us your understanding ... and we'll all be better for it," Johnston said.

Sen. Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, followed

Johnston's speech. Kerr also voiced his admiration for all of the students who showed up to support the cause. Kerr asked the students to do two things while lobbying: to express priorities as they see them and to take a look at the bigger picture.

Kerr said the government has a budget crisis, due to over-extension, causing cutbacks. He added that tion can be created.

After the speeches, the students joined hands and circled the capitol to show their support. Some students started the wave and chanted "Margin of Excellence — not mediocrity." They proceeded into the capitol where some students met with their legislators to discuss their concerns.

More than 250 college students traveled to Topeka Monday for the Associated Students of Kansas Lobby Day at the Capitol.

Students from the six regents schools with ASK chapters were at the rally. Beth Hashman, junior in secondary education at K-State, was rallying to make a difference.

"Our hope is to show the government that we support the MOE and hope that it makes a difference," Hashman said.

Tom Ross, a senior at Pittsburg State University, said his concerns are establishing a base on which to build and the raise in the student's salaries. Part of ASK's platform is to raise the salaries of students by 5 percent to help the students meet rising living and educational costs.

Other areas of the proposed platform for 1990 are enrollment adjustments, fee releases and MOE. Financial assistance programs ASK supports are Graduate Fee Waivers, Minority Scholarship Program and Youth Education Service.

Kern calls for peace in Senate

By Kirk Caraway
Collegian Reporter

A special meeting of Student Senate has been requested by Senate Chairman Chris Kern to discuss problems the body has been having in recent weeks.

Kern made an emotional statement to the members of Senate Executive Committee Monday night in an attempt to diffuse fighting within the group.

"There's going to be no more credibility bashing, no more trying to go on these little power trips," Kern said. "I'm not going to tolerate it much more. We need to start caring about what the students want."

Kern said the meeting, scheduled for 5:30 tonight, is set to help heal some of the wounds caused by recent controversial issues such as the dispute over Student Body President Todd Johnson's appointments to Tribunal.

"This meeting is to get everybody working together again," Kern said. "It's not supposed to be anything negative. It's supposed to be positive."

Recent clashes over judicial appointments and ASK funds have raised tensions among a number of senators and the executive branch. Johnson took a combative stance over the way he was treated in Senate.

"I'm going to have my day in Senate," Johnson said. "There was a shadow cast over all my appointments."

After some tense discussion, the committee members took on a more positive approach and agreed to work out their problems.

"I think we should be focused on how we did things, not what the final action was," said Travis Stumpff, Senate vice chairman.

"We need to discuss more things in (Executive Committee)," Johnson said. Stumpff and Johnson have been the central figures in these disputes. "I don't want to be pointing fingers at people," Kern said. "I want to be discussing what needs to be done."

Other committee members expressed their approval of the special meeting.

"I think this could be a very constructive time," said Rebecca Brown, legislative affairs committee

All Azerbaijani delegates march out of legislature

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The entire Azerbaijani delegation to the national legislature stormed out of a session Monday after the Soviet defense minister refused to accept blame for deaths in a military crackdown on the uprising in the southern republic, sources said.

The dramatic walkout by the approximately 15-member delegation occurred in a closed-door Kremlin session of the Supreme Soviet called to discuss the Azerbaijani-Armenian dispute over Nagorno-Karabakh and ethnic clashes resulting from it.

Although reporters were barred from the seven-hour session and it was not televised as most sessions are, two participants — Vitautas A. Statulyavicius of Lithuania and Arkady N. Murashev of Moscow — gave details in telephone interviews.

Deputies decided to close the session, chaired by President Mikhail S. Gorbachev, to reporters because of the sensitive nature of the topic, debate on which has sparked clashes in the past.

Murashev said the Azerbaijanis walked out after Defense Minister Dmitri T. Yazov "insulted the Azerbaijani delegation." According to the deputy, Yazov said that when the Azerbaijani delegates discussed victims of the nationalist uprising, they blamed the army. Yazov contended Azerbaijani extremists were to blame.

Violent protests to be curbed

BUCHAREST, Romania (AP) — Interim President Ion Iliescu said Monday the army and police should have more power to curb protests because violent anti-government demonstrations could lead to anarchy and a new dictatorship.

More than 300 people staged a rally Monday evening, but this one was well away from government headquarters — Sunday's target — after 12 armored personnel carriers and hundreds of soldiers blocked access.

One soldier, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said that unlike Sunday, when the army was "caught unprepared by the angry demonstrators," soldiers now had "very specific orders to let no one near the building."

About 5,000 miners rallied on Monday in support of the government, angrily demanding an end to protests that culminated Sunday when about 500 people ransacked government headquarters, smashing windows and doors with rocks and iron carpet rods.

Some miners attacked bystanders with sticks. At least four onlookers were injured, including a gray-haired man rescued from the miners by soldiers.

Iliescu said the 21-member Executive Bureau of the ruling Provisional Council of National Unity decided to propose a law "increasing the power of those organizations that must maintain law and order and defend institutions and citizens against violent acts."

Object's explosion kills 3

JAKARTA, Indonesia (AP) — An object believed to be a bomb from World War II exploded as four fishermen were pounding on it, killing three and leaving one missing, a newspaper reported Monday.

Police officer Abdul Malik told the newspaper Suara Karya that a villager saw the four pounding on a cylindrical object as he set out fishing on Saturday. The villager said he had gone only about 220 yards from the four when a huge explosion sent the fishermen flying.

Malik said the object apparently was an unexploded bomb from World War II.

The explosion occurred at Paluh Lembu village, in Belawan, North Sumatra, 875 miles northwest of Jakarta, the paper said.

Natural food high cancer risk

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — Natural carcinogens in meat, grain and other foods are a far greater danger than pesticides and additives, accounting for more than 98 percent of the cancer risk in the diet, a government scientist said Monday.

Even a minor reduction in these naturally occurring hazards, he said, would surpass the benefits of eliminating all traces of dangerous manmade chemicals.

The culprits include not only such recognized health hazards as fats and beer but such seemingly innocent products as bread, yogurt, mushrooms and many spices, including cinnamon and nutmeg.

"The risk is from natural carcinogens in the diet, because they overwhelm all the others," said Dr. Robert J. Scheuplein, director of the Office of Toxicological Sciences at the U.S. Food and Drug Administration.

He contended that the public is worried about the wrong risks in their diet, in part because of exaggerated news accounts of such scares as Alar in apples, cyanide in grapes and dioxin in milk.

Ethiopian port shut down

WASHINGTON (AP) — The lives of up to 5 million Ethiopians are at risk because anti-government forces have shut down a port that has been the key entry point for outside food assistance, U.S. officials say.

Further aggravating the situation has been the prospect of severely diminished harvests throughout northern Ethiopia as a result of poor rainfall.

To the west, U.S. officials say a crisis situation is rapidly developing in the Sudan, where a bitter civil war has prevented the transport of relief supplies to rebel-held territory in the southern part of the country.

President Bush sent a letter to the Sudanese president last week asking for his cooperation in restarting the international relief effort, to which the United States contributes $15.7 million.

Renewed fighting has led to the suspension of food flights to southern Sudan and the government also is preventing the departure of a relief train along a route where food shortages are severe. The rebels also have been blocking relief efforts.

Notification supporters testify

TOPEKA (AP) — They came in droves, armed with testimony, babies and a sign accusing a doctor of murder. One couple even performed a skit between a legislator and God.

They came with one purpose: to support a House bill that would require doctors to notify parents if their daughters sought an abortion, hoping the committee would recommend it favorably to the House.

Sixteen witnesses testified before the House Federal and State Affairs Committee Monday in an emotionally charged atmosphere, while numerous others lined the walls and spilled out into the hallway. Opponents of the measure will be heard today.

Committee Chairwoman Rep. Ginger Barr, R-Auburn, kept a tight rein on the proceedings, giving each witness exactly 2 1/2 minutes to speak, timed by a stopwatch. Conferees had a total of one hour to testify. That was followed by almost an hour of questions by the legislators.

The spokesmen testified in favor of a bill sponsored by Rep. Artie Lucas, R-Highland, that would require doctors to make a diligent effort to notify both parents when a girl under 18 seeks an abortion. Under the bill's provisions, doctors would have to wait 48 hours after giving notice before performing the abortion.

In the case of incest, the Department of Social and Rehabilitative Services can notify the courts, in lieu of parental notification.

Committee proposes code

TOPEKA (AP) — The House would have a written code of ethics and a standing committee on ethics under a proposal introduced Monday by 19 representatives.

Twelve Republicans and seven Democrats are sponsoring a resolution that would basically amend the House's rules to enact an ethics code. It would establish a procedure under which members could be reprimanded for violating conflict-of-interest standards.

The resolution would not create another law, and would apply only to House members. The Senate would not have to approve it and senators would not be subject to it.

The measure's introduction came as a House Elections subcommittee is preparing to begin work on a comprehensive package of proposed reforms in state ethics laws.

Group offers help to single parents

Discussions focus on daily problems

By Margaret Clarkin
Collegian Reporter

The Single Parent Support Group helps normalize life for single parents.

It helps single parents feel they are not so alone, said Vicki Brown, group facilitator and graduate student in human development and family studies. Brown is also a single parent.

The group is sponsored by New Directions, a division within the College of Education, in conjunction with University for Man.

"Our goal was to provide this arena for them to meet in," said Sharon Tally, coordinator of New Directions.

The group allows single parents to meet and discuss some of the different problems they face.

"We discuss everyday, practical things," Brown said. "Like how to deal with co-parenting, children's behavior changes after visits with one parent and some of the games that go on between the ex-spouse, the child and us."

The group began last fall after several single parents expressed their interest in a support group, Tally said. The focus of the group is students, but anyone can attend.

"We had a lot of requests from people who wanted to know of single parent support groups," Tally said. "At that time, we didn't really know of too many. So we thought we would go ahead and get one started."

One of the obstacles they faced was the problem of child care during the meetings, Tally said. The group needed a place to meet, along with volunteers who could provide child care.

At the time, UFM had just received a federal grant that would allow them to make space available for family development programs.

The grant had several components. One was to equip an area for child care. Any family development or living group would be able to use this space, said Olivia Collins, family life education coordinator at UFM.

"It's been a cooperative effort between UFM and New Directions to get the program initiated. Now our biggest problem is to get word around about the group, to see if there are others who would like to join,"

Students to visit with counselors

By Angela Tholstrup
Collegian Reporter

More than 9,000 invitations to a principal-counselor-student conference scheduled for Wednesday were sent to K-State students who graduated from Kansas high schools.

The conference is a time for high school officials to talk to former students about high school curricula, said Richard Elkins, director of admissions. For more than 30 years, high schools have gained valuable feedback from the conferences, he said.

The schools learn what courses need improvement, and hear both positive and negative feedback, Elkins said. K-State gains feedback because students tell about their educational experiences.

In preparation for the conference, Concordia High School sent questionnaires that would aid in counseling students. The questionnaires asked about high school preparation for college courses, life and housing, said Melvin Davenport, guidance counselor at Concordia High School.

The conferences and other questionnaires have had a positive effect on making curriculum changes, Davenport said, especially in English and math.

About 300 officials from about 200 high schools are registered to attend Wednesday. The University of Kansas will have a similar

High speed cited in accident

Police uncertain whether students' deaths alcohol-related

By The Collegian Staff

High speed was a factor in the accident that killed two freshmen early Sunday morning, said the investigating officer, Trooper Byron Wade.

Tami Borck, freshman in pre-law from Larned, and Jennifer Bedell, freshman in physical education from Shawnee, died in the one-car accident near Larned.

Wade said excessive vehicle speed had been determined from skid mark tests, damage to Borck's car and damages to objects struck by the car.

The exact speed of the car has not been determined yet, he said.

Blood analysis tests were taken to determine if the Borck was driving under the influence of alcohol, Wade said. The samples were sent to the Kansas Bureau of Investigation Lab in Topeka, and it could take several days before the results are known. Wade said liquor could be smelled at the scene of the accident, but he was uncertain if the women had been drinking.

An accident reconstructionist is working on the investigation with Wade.

Wade said both women were ejected from the vehicle. According to autopsy reports, Borck appeared to be the driver of the car because of chest injuries she received, he said.

The autopsies were performed in Great Bend at the Central Kansas Medical Center, Wade said.

A memorial service for the women will be at 7 p.m. Thursday at the All Faiths Chapel, said Barb Robel, adviser for Greek Affairs.

Rental inspection to be studied 'in-depth'

By The Collegian Staff

A citizen's committee will attempt to finalize a rental inspection program draft for Manhattan at 7 p.m. Wednesday at the Headquarter Fire Station.

The committee will be presented the third draft of a rental inspection program at the meeting, which is the final scheduled work session before the program is presented to the City Council at 4 p.m. Feb. 27.

"The intent of this meeting is to give the citizen's committee the chance to discuss the rental inspection program in-depth," said Mike Conduff, city manager.

The public hearing will meet in the auditorium of the station on the northeast corner of Kimball and Denison avenues. Previous meetings were located in the City Council Room in City Hall. The change of location was prompted by the overflow audience at the last meeting.

The meeting, scheduled from 7 to 9 p.m., was moved from the afternoon to the evening. Wade Whitmer, director of the Consumer Relations Board on campus, said this change would allow more of the renters to

Racial jokes form of discrimination

In a recent letter to the editor, Brent Shaffer makes a distinction between prejudice and racism. While his intent in doing so was not completely clear to me, he seemed to imply that racism is worse than prejudice. For example, prejudice, as defined by Shaffer to include racial jokes, "should not cost anyone a job." The implication is that perhaps racism, however Shaffer defines it, should cost a person his job.

In fact, racial prejudice is a form of racism, pure and simple, and should be just as reprehensible as any form of overt discrimination. For Shaffer's benefit, let us review some basic social psychology.

We all do the best we can to understand the world around us, but the world is an extremely complicated place. For example, we meet hundreds of people every year, all different, and in order to make our job of understanding them a bit easier, we find it convenient to categorize people into groups of various kinds. Some common examples are men, women, black, white, tall, short, blonde, brunette, K-State student, University of Kansas student, Christian, Jew and so forth. So far, no harm done.

Over time, based on what we observe and on what others tell us, we come to believe that people in these various groups are alike in certain ways, and we develop generalizations about these groups that may help us to distinguish one from another.

These generalizations are called stereotypes, and within limits, stereotypes can be useful to us by helping us to recognize patterns in the social world around us. The stereotypes we hold are more often true than not. For example, I have a stereotype of NBA basketball players as tall. Since most NBA players are, in fact, taller than the average man, my stereotype is generally true.

Unfortunately, stereotypes are seldom true 100 percent of the time, and we have a tendency to overgeneralize. As a result, two things happen. We may inappropriately ascribe a particular attribute to a person because she or he is a member of a group about which we hold a stereotype. Also, because we know our stereotypes are not always true, we often do not bother to modify them, even when we are confronted with quite a few cases where the stereotype is false.

Robert Lowman

GUEST COLUMNIST

That brings us to prejudice. Prejudice is a stereotype that unjustly characterizes members of a certain group. We may hold prejudices against any recognizable group, including religions, races, ethnic groups, age groups, gender groups or groups based on sexual preference, college attendance, weight, academic major, military status or type of clothing worn. Prejudices can be for or against a group, although negative prejudices tend to be the more destructive.

Prejudice is an attitude, but it can be a very powerful one. In its extreme form, it leads to hatred of another human being simply because of that person's membership in a group against which you are prejudiced.

Next, we move into another realm of behavior. When we act in a manner that is unjust toward a person because of that person's membership in a recognizable group, we are discriminating. We might think of discrimination as the acting out of our prejudices, although it might be theoretically possible for someone to discriminate and not be prejudiced.

Finally, we get to racism, and here is where Shaffer fell short in his analysis. Racism is defined in Webster's Ninth New Collegiate Dictionary (second definition), as "racial prejudice or discrimination." Behavioral and social scientists generally define it about the same way. In other words, racism can be unwarranted attitude or behavior.

Returning to racial jokes, it is difficult to understand how telling these jokes can be perceived as anything but racism. The punch line of a racial joke is based on an unjust characterization of a racial group. The punch line is only funny if a person believes the prejudicial premise on which the joke is based. Because talking is a form of behavior, telling the racial joke is a form of racial discrimination.

Finding the joke funny is a form of racial prejudice. Both are forms of racism. Shaffer asked two rhetorical questions, "Have you ever told a Polish or Mexican joke, or at least laughed at one? Then are you and whoever else a racist?" Shaffer, if the answer to your first question is yes, the answer to your second question most certainly is too.

Racial jokes are racist. They demean the person who tells them; they should insult the person who hears them. They are completely and unequivocally inappropriate for any person in a position of public trust, whether that person be an elected official, a law enforcement officer, a teacher or a journalist.

Shaffer, as a senior, this may be your last semester in college. If you graduate from K-State believing that racial prejudice is not racism, and that it is acceptable for people in positions of public trust to tell racial or ethnic jokes, we have failed in your education. I hope it is not too late.

Campus buildings not sufficiently protected

There are 19 accidents waiting to happen on campus.

That's how many of the 71 campus buildings do not have fire alarms, smoke detectors or alarm pull stations.

The state has no funds to replace buildings "accidentally" gutted by fire. So once they're gone, they're gone, unless private funds can be raised to replace them.

And once again, it boils down to money. It would cost about $500,000 over the next four fiscal years to bring buildings up to current standards. But state officials are dragging their feet when it comes to providing the funding.

We aren't even guaranteed the University will upgrade the safety equipment, because, thanks to a grandfather clause, they do not have to bring those buildings up to standard unless they are remodeled.

As budget cuts force students out of their classes, and graduate students out of their jobs, skewed priorities leave a quarter of the buildings on campus dangerously unprotected.

In a flash, these buildings, not to mention their occupants and furnishings, could be gone, and state funds would not replace them.

Last year, it cost about $100,000 to build a stone gateway to K-State on Manhattan Avenue. There is no way 19 buildings could be rebuilt for a fraction of the cost it would take to protect them from possible fire damage now.

State officials should align their priorities and take preventative measures to keep structures safe and in place.

Seabourn logical

Editor,

Many Christians have been upset by Brad Seabourn's columns questioning (attacking? ridiculing?) some aspects of Christianity. They shouldn't be.

Mr. Seabourn is using essentially a rational, logical approach in his arguments. Christianity is essentially based in faith and belief, not logic and rationality. Faith and logic may be two separate systems, almost separate universes. Logic can't, or at least shouldn't, affect faith.

Rudyard Kipling said, "East is East and West is West, and never the twain shall meet."

Besides, Seabourn is probably just yanking your chain and getting his jollies from your outraged reactions.

Lively was lacking

Editor,

While reading Dwayne Lively's article on American teenagers needing sex licenses, I noticed that several important ideas were missing.

Now, imagine if you will, a scene from "Miami Vice" in which Don Johnson is cruising in his boat along the Florida coastline, when he spies a young couple neck deep in the ocean, near the shore. He knows that this is an easy bust because with his Jimmy Houston sunglasses he can actually see below the water's surface. Plus, as an added bonus, he knows that there is nowhere to conceal their fancy-smancy sex licenses without getting them soaking wet.

In the heat of passion our poor, unsuspecting couple forgot that international waters, where this activity would be legal, are 200 miles out, so "swimming for it" is out of the question.

Actually, I think we can do away with the licenses themselves and just tattoo the law on the butts of teenagers. This would be great for the kids, because if a cop ever asks for ID, the kids can just drop their pants and give authority the full moon, legally. This is what the rebellious adolescents of today's society really want to do in the first place, right?

Lastly, if the police pull you and your girlfriend over in the middle of the night and you're both hot and sweaty, but in proper attire, could you be arrested on the smoking gun theory?

Articles appalling

Editor,

I am writing in regard to the Feb. 7 issue of the Collegian.

I have two points I would like to bring up. One, your front page article on strippers, and two, the insert that came with the paper, U., The National College Newspaper.

I was very surprised, shocked actually, that an article on strippers would ever appear on the front page of any newspaper. I have never been to a strip show and do not plan to go to one. I did read the article to know what I am writing about. I am normally a "live and let live" person but I feel compelled to ask questions of the Collegian's integrity.

If the strippers are so proud of what they are doing why are the female strippers not giving their names or letting their parents know what they are doing? The way I look at it, if that is what taking pride in doing a job is, then I want no part in pride.

I move to the insert.

The particular article I would like to "expose" is the article on beer drinking games. Alcohol is a drug just as cocaine, heroin, etc. are drugs. Alcohol is legal. Cocaine, heroin, etc. are illegal. Alcohol causes many deaths and countless injuries yearly. I do not see an attitude of game playing in this. College students' sole purpose should not be drinking, as the article suggests, but getting an education.

In spite of the stripper article and the insert I will continue to read the Collegian — for the comics.

Drugs not hype

Editor,

Wow! America doesn't have a drug problem — it's all drug hype, paranoia and politics. I realize Kirk Caraway's article is just another cheap shot at the republicans. I think I know what would be better than Dan Quayle smoking crack on television — you, Kirk, could replace one of the dummies on those seat belt ads. You could stick your head through the windshield and say drugs and driving are just hype.

About four years ago, my best friend was killed after he got drunk and rolled his car in a ditch. So I disagree that drugs, such as alcohol, marijuana and cocaine, are just hype. Recently, the CBS News showed that increasing number of babies are born with cocaine addiction, but that was probably just hype.

Last but not least, you have written a series of articles criticizing President Bush, yet you don't offer any solutions about how to make a better America. Your articles must have all been media hype.

Progress made

Editor,

The South African government must be held accountable for the 71 prisoners who died while detained without charges under South African's stringent security laws.

Just as the Soviet Union must be held responsible for the thousands of men and women sentenced to "mental hospitals" or the gulag, with little hope of ever regaining their freedom.

Mikhail Gorbachev, however, by recognizing past atrocities and moving quickly to abolish them, has rapidly established himself as a leader dedicated to constructive reform.

President De Klerk has similarly proved himself to be the new leader in southern Africa. His swift decision to order a thorough investigation into the recent prison death of Clayton Sistole underscores his efforts to clean up the police force and crack down on strong-arm police tactics. He has released political prisoners, curtailed human rights abuses, and called for a new constitution which will allow social and political freedom for all South Africans.

The challenges facing these two leaders are formidable indeed, yet both men have met them with courage and determination. Unable to change the past, they strive to create a new future.

The United States, recognizing Soviet achievements, is strongly supporting Gorbachev's efforts to institutionalize his reforms. It is time for the United States to lend the same support to the government and people of South Africa.

Lemieux to be out for up to 6 weeks

By The Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — Mario Lemieux, the NHL's leading scorer, probably will miss the rest of the regular season while he undergoes six weeks of therapy for a herniated disc in his lower back, his doctor said Monday.

"Realistically, we're hoping to get him back for the playoffs ... if the (Pittsburgh) Penguins make the playoffs," Dr. Charles Burke said.

Lemieux flew to Los Angeles last Saturday and will remain there for a cortisone injection on Tuesday and four weeks of isometric exercises, rest and therapy.

At best, Burke said the two-time NHL scoring champion might be able to play again in six weeks, following 10 days to two weeks of additional rehabilitation after he returns to Pittsburgh from Los Angeles.

Burke and other doctors, including two spine specialists, have agreed surgery to remove the disc is a last resort because of a secondary, arthritis-like condition that is causing complications.

"It's a complex problem he has ... and this treatment is the only chance he has of playing again this season," Burke said. "If he doesn't make progress, there's a good chance he'll have surgery ... but there is some risk involved."

"It's not a simple herniated disc. If he has surgery and the abnormality in his back causing his bones to destabilize, he still might have back pain and have trouble returning to play."

Missouri goes to No. 1 as 'Hawks drop to 2nd

By The Associated Press

Missouri is No. 1, again at the expense of Kansas.

The Tigers returned to the top spot in The Associated Press college basketball poll on Monday following a week in which they again beat the Jayhawks and knocked them out of the No. 1 ranking.

Missouri (24-2), second last week, beat Kansas and Oklahoma in Big Eight Conference games last week and garnered 61½ first-place votes and 1,596½ points from the nationwide panel of sportswriters and broadcasters.

The Jayhawks (25-2), two-time losers to Missouri, ended their second two-week run as No. 1 with half a first-place vote and 1,510½ points. Missouri and Kansas both have games at Oklahoma this week. The Sooners, ranked 10th this week, have a 43-game homecourt winning streak.

Duke (22-4) beat Stetson, East Carolina and Wake Forest last week and moved from sixth to third with 1,384 points, just one more point than UNLV (22-4), which also jumped three spots from a week ago. The Runnin' Rebels beat two ranked teams in their three victories last week — New Mexico State and Arizona.

Georgetown (20-3), received one first-place and fell two places to fifth after a loss to Providence. La Salle (22-1) received the other first-place vote was 14th.

Connecticut (22-4) followed the Hoyas in sixth with 1,127 points, while Michigan (19-5) was seventh with 1,088 points.

Georgia Tech (19-4) was eighth with 1,042 points, 19 more than Purdue (18-4) and 44 more than Oklahoma (19-4), which rounded out the Top Ten.

The Top Ten comes from just five conferences. The Big Eight has the top two teams and Oklahoma, while the Atlantic Coast Conference (Duke and Georgia Tech), Big East (Georgetown and Connecticut) and Big Ten (Michigan and Purdue) have two each. UNLV plays in the Big West.

Syracuse, fourth last week, tumbled to 11th after losses to Villanova and Notre Dame. The Orangemen were followed by Louisiana State, Arkansas, La Salle, Michigan State, Louisville, Oregon State, Minnesota, and Illinois and Xavier, Ohio, which tied for 19th.

Arizona was in the first of the final five spots, followed by Loyola Marymount, Clemson, New Mexico State and Indiana.

Fourth-place teams to clash

By Scott Paske
Sports Reporter

Oklahoma State coach Leonard Hamilton is a bit more confident than his K-State colleague Lon Kruger when it comes to post-season tournament talk.

"It's almost ridiculous to even think we can't get five teams in the NCAA Tournament," Hamilton said of the Big Eight Conference. "I couldn't even fix my mouth to say four teams will get in."

"I think there's no way we don't deserve five teams."

"I certainly think the fifth-place team will receive a tremendous amount of consideration," Kruger said. "But that fifth team will be on the bubble more than we would like to be."

The Wildcats can lessen Kruger's apprehensiveness with a win tonight at Bramlage Coliseum over the Cow-boys. Both teams enter the 8:05 contest tied for fourth in the league race with 5-5 records. K-State is 15-11 overall. O-State is 14-9.

"This is a big ball game, as all of them are at this point in the season,"

Kruger said. "I don't think it will be tough for O-State's kids or the K-State kids to be ready."

The 'Cats scaled another peak in their topsy-turvy season Saturday with a 93-90 win over Iowa State at Ames. K-State, behind the three-point shooting of senior Steve Henson, rallied from a 12-point second-half deficit to send the game into overtime.

Henson scored seven of his career-high 41 points in the extra period, and freshman Askia Jones hit a desperation three-pointer at the buzzer to keep K-State in the hunt for an upper-division finish.

Henson, who tied a Big Eight record with eight three-pointers, earned Big Eight player of the week honors.

"It was a classic shooting exhibition," Kruger said. "He was shooting shots that he felt were going in. If a kid thinks it's going in when he shoots it, we don't have any problem with that."

The Cowboys feature a surging player of their own in sophomore Byron Houston. Houston, a 6-foot-7 center, has led O-State in scoring the last eight games, averaging 23.3 points during that stretch. In the 'Pokes' 103-84 win over Nebraska on Wednesday, Houston burned the Cornhuskers for a career-high 35 points and 15 rebounds.

Billy Ray Smith and the rest of the Wildcats will look to take full possession of fourth place in the Big Eight Conference standings tonight when Oklahoma State visits for an 8:05 matchup in Bramlage Coliseum.

Houston has been the Cowboys' top rebounder in 17 of 23 games this season.

"Byron is definitely one of the better players in the league," Kruger said. "He's big, very physical and has certainly been a big factor in their success."

K-State is hoping to avenge an 89-67 pounding from the Cowboys Jan. 31 at Stillwater, Okla. The Cowboys shot 67 percent from the field and hit 33-of-47 free throws in the win.

"We have to do practically everything better than we did down there to win," Kruger said. "They outshot us, outrebounded us and beat us in about every possible phase."

NOTES: K-State ticket manager Carol Adolph announced that seats are still available for tonight's game with O-State ... Henson, with 41 points; and Jean Derouillere, with 21 points, against Iowa State Saturday, marked the highest combined point total by a guard tandem in K-State history ... The 'Cats lead the career series with O-State 62-23, including a 29-6 advantage in Manhattan.

Wildcat pair sweeps Big 8 weekly honor for 2nd time this year

Henson averages 21 for week; tallies 41 at Iowa State

From Staff and Wire Reports

K-State guard Steve Henson was a unanimous selection for the Big Eight player of the week award, marking the second time this season the McPherson senior has won the honor.

Henson, a unanimous selection by a media panel, scored a career-high 41 points in the 93-90 overtime win at Iowa State on Saturday. His eight three-pointers tied a Big Eight record set by Oklahoma's Dave Sieger against Nebraska. It also eclipsed the previous K-State record of seven, set by Will Scott in 1988.

His point total against the Cyclones tied him for fifth-best in K-State history with Mitch Richmond, who netted 41 during his senior season against Oklahoma.

"Steve Henson was about as good as I've ever seen," Iowa State coach Johnny Orr said. "It was tremendous. He made some very difficult shots. It wasn't as if he was standing there wide open."

"It was one of those performances that will get better as you look at it each month and each year," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "It wasn't a situation where he was just piling up numbers late in the game. We really needed every one of those to win the game."

Henson, who hit seven second-half three pointers and 8-of-12 for the game, said Saturday's performance was unique.

"I've never had a feeling quite like that," Henson said. "The only thing I can remember from the second half is seeing the rim."

Earlier in the week, Henson scored 21 points with seven rebounds and four assists in an 85-69 loss at Oklahoma. He went 8-of-14 from the field, including five three-pointers.

On the week, Henson went 13-of-20 from three-point range.

Henson, the preseason favorite to be voted the Big Eight's player of the year in a poll of local media, is among the top 12 in six different statistical categories in the Big Eight.

He is fifth in steals, third in three-point average, 10th in three-point percentage, fifth in assists, second in free throw percentage, and 12th in scoring. He is the only player to rank in the top seven of six different categories in Big Eight games only.

Hazim scores 44 in pair of Lady Cats' home victories

From Staff and Wire Reports

Junior guard Nadira Hazim was named the women's Big Eight player of the week Monday, completing a K-State sweep of the conference honors for the second time this season.

K-State's Steve Henson also won the weekly honor on the men's side.

"I think it's great for both of them," Lady Cats' interim coach Gaye Griffin said. "Steve had an awesome weekend, and Nadira's been playing really well for us."

In K-State's 92-88 win over Oklahoma last Wednesday, Hazim scored 24 points on 9-of-13 field goal attempts and 6-of-9 free throws. She also added six rebounds, three assists and one steal.

Hazim then led K-State to a 69-67 victory over Iowa State with a game-high 20 points, eight rebounds, three assists and seven steals Saturday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

"It's fantastic," Griffin said of Hazim's award. "I was real excited for her. She had a great week. Seven steals and 20 points against Oklahoma is pretty good. She's spent a lot of extra time in the gym, and it has paid off. She's contributing well for us."

Hazim, who was also named Player of the Week on Jan. 15, now stands 13th on K-State's career scoring list with 1,079 points.

Hazim, one of three Lady Cat players to win the player of week award this season, is second on the team in scoring with an average of 15.2 points a game, second in assists with nearly eight per game, and fourth in rebounding with 5.1 a game.

It was the fourth time in six weeks that the Lady Cats have picked up the weekly player award. Diana Miller has won it twice this year, and Kristie Bahner also won the honor in January.

Point guard Steve Henson was named Big Eight player of the week Monday after impressive performances in his last two contests.

Lady Cats' guard Nadira Hazim garnered her second Big Eight player of the week award in little more than a month Monday.

Blood drive to begin today

University donations help Red Cross reach 1,400-unit goal

By Angela Tholstrup
Collegian Reporter

Red Cross of Wichita's three Bloodmobile units will be on campus Feb. 20-23 in the K, S and U rooms at the K-State Union. Donations will be taken from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m.

Red Cross requires a quota of 350 to 360 units of blood per day to meet the needs of 130 Kansas hospitals, said Cindy Burke, campus coordinator of the Bloodmobile.

"Mobile units are sent out usually one mobile unit at a time to one site, and those sites last one to two days in small communities around the state," Burke said.

When the blood drive comes to K-State all three mobile units are used.

The K-State drive is the largest blood drive in the entire state, Burke said. The Red Cross could get its entire quota of 1,400 units for the four days from K-State.

"They depend a lot on the donations from K-State because they aren't getting donations from anywhere else," Burke said.

K-State students are usually generous donors when compared to University of Kansas students. In three days, KU gives about the same amount given in one day at K-State, Sonnenfeld said.

The blood drive here also attracts people from the community and Manhattan Christian College, she said.

Last semester, President Jon We-fald allowed faculty and staff an hour off from work to donate blood. This option will be available again, Sonnenfeld said.

Appointments were taken in the Union from Tuesday through Friday, said Sonnenfeld. About 500 appointments were made, she said, but walk-ins are encouraged. The donating process usually takes about an hour, depending upon how many people are in line.

The process moves donors through five stations. At the first station, the donor's blood pressure and temperature is taken. At the second station, health checks are given. The volunteer must be at least 17 years old, weigh 110 pounds or more and be in general good health.

At the second station, the donor is also screened for anemia, AIDS, blood transfusions, pregnancy and other health concerns.

The third station is the option station. The donor has the option of labeling the blood usable or not usable.

"The person can donate, but a sticker will tell the computer if it can be used or not," Sonnenfeld said.

The purpose of allowing donors to give blood even when it's not usable allows them to give the appearance of health when otherwise might prove embarrassing for them for whatever reason, she said.

The fourth station is where the blood is taken. Donating blood takes about 15 minutes, Burke said.

The final station is the canteen. The donor sits down to drink water, tea or orange juice and eat donuts to help start replenishing the blood supply, Sonnenfeld said. Donors stay at the canteen at least 10 minutes.

The pre-checks take the longest, but they are important in detecting AIDS and hepatitis, Sonnenfeld said.

"It is worth it, because you know you will be helping someone," she said.

Last semester, 1,598 units of blood were collected, Sonnenfeld said. The units are seldom used as full units, but are separated into three smaller units, Burke said.

"An individual is helping out three other people," she said.

More than 400 volunteers helped with the blood drive during the fall semester, including 16 nurses, 82 community people and 312 students. Volunteers are always needed, Sonnenfeld said.

Financial aid office buys new filing system

By Chris McEntee
Collegian Reporter

Students receiving financial aid will soon have relief when it comes to paying fees.

The Office of Student Financial Assistance has purchased a new comprehensive real-time, on-line system that will make records easier to keep and retrieve, said Larry Viterna, director of the financial assistance office.

The system, consisting of Financial Aid Management and Billing Receivables software, was purchased from Information Associates at a cost of $160,000, he said.

A "Kick-Off Event" for faculty members will be from 1:30 to 3:30 p.m. today in the K-State Union Big Eight Room for implementation of the new computer software, Viterna said.

Spence Gould of Information Associates will highlight what the project entails, present project timelines and benefits to the University.

"We will be able to do so much more directly from the terminals instead of running around to different places," Viterna said. "Currently, we are operating under a batch update mode, which delays student file resolution. A real-time, on-line system will make us much more effective and efficient in serving students."

Billing and financial aid management will be interfaced, he said.

The system is located in the basement of Farrell Library, and is strictly for use by the administration, said Nazih Darwiche, assistant director of computing.

During 1989-90, more than $40 million in student aid will be handled or monitored through the financial aid office, Viterna said.

"More than 70 percent of K-State students use the services of our office, and all students are involved with the controller's office through the fee payment process. The new system will have a highly visible impact upon all of them," he said.

All monies are now disbursed through a separate check for each program for each student for each semester, he said.

The BRS will allow crediting of those dollars to the students' accounts, virtually eliminating the need for separate checks.

Viterna said electronic fund transfer will also allow a quicker flow of dollars to the campus from the U.S. Department of Education and from lenders.

The new software system will be able to perform all the functions required of any financial aid office, Darwiche said. The same system is in use at the University of Colorado and the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, he said.

There are three phases to the start of a new system: testing, training and production. The project team will first train how to use the system, then use test data to see that it works correctly and finally put the real life data to work, Darwiche said.

"We will continue to use the current system through this next academic year. We will start the new system in March of 1991 and it will actually go in effect for students enrolling in the 1991-92 school year," Viterna said.

chairwoman. "A lot of the new senators were blown away," said Jackie McClaskey, Senate parliamentarian. "They don't know why things are like they are. I think (the meeting) will be a great benefit especially to them."

"I think we all need to sit down and have a little chat," Kern said. "We're not going to conduct any business. I'm hoping we can just get together on things. It's all right to question things, but I think people are doing things for themselves and not the student body. Everyone should be working for the same goal."

Kern said he plans on inviting several guests to speak at the special meeting. He said that he hoped senators could learn something from others with student government experience. Those he planned to invite included: Ira Bolden, former cabinet member and student body presidential candidate; Justin Sanders, former graduate senator; Troy Lubbers, former student body president; and Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities.

"I really don't know what will come out of it," Kern said.

Soviet troops stormed into Baku, the Azerbaijani capital, on Jan. 20, a week after Azerbaijanis attacked ethnic Armenian residents. Official reports say 139 were killed in the city since the troops moved in, including 106 civilians, 28 troops and five policemen.

Before they walked out, Azerbaijani delegates demanded that troops be withdrawn and reaffirmed their republic's control over Nagorno-Karabakh, the district at the heart of the dispute with the republic of Armenia, Statulyavicus said.

Armenian delegates, however, pressed their republic's demand for control of the district, the Lithuanian deputy said.

in a pre-college curriculum designated by the regents, score 21 or better on the American College Test or graduate in the top third of their high school classes.

Standards for out-of-state students would be higher. They would have to have a 2.5 grade-point average in the pre-college curriculum, score 23 or better on the ACT or graduate in the top third of their high school classes.

The bill also contains provisions to allow community college students to transfer to state universities with no particular grade point average or test scores, and to allow for persons with General Equivalency Degrees instead of high school diplomas to enter regents universities.

In addition, each university could make exceptions for a number of students equal to 15 percent of its entering freshman class. Rep. Jack Shriver, D-Arkansas City, asked whether universities would use the provision to admit athletes.

"I don't want to give them a window to bring in jocks," Francisco said.

conference Thursday, Elkins said. "We flip-flop each year with KU," he said. "This year ours is on Wednesday and theirs is on Thursday."

The conference will start with refreshments from 8 to 8:45 a.m. in the K-State Union Courtyard. At 8:45, a panel will discuss "Making Sense of the Enhanced ACT: Using it at K-State" in the Union Forum Hall.

The old American Collegiate Testing Program exams had four scores: math, English, social science and natural sciences, Elkins said. The new Enhanced ACT has an English category with two sub-categories, a math category with three sub-categories, a reading test, and a science reasoning comprehensive.

Because of the breakdown to specific sections, the new ACT exams will help high schools identify areas needing strengthening, Davenport said.

Students can meet with their high school officials from 10:15 a.m. to 12:15 p.m. in the Union or in Ahearn Field House. A casual luncheon will be provided from 12:30 to 1:30 p.m. in the Union Ballroom.

From 1:45 to 2:45 p.m., another panel will discuss "College Credit Before High School Graduation: Advantages and Disadvantages" in Forum Hall.

friends have developed many inside jokes about homosexuality.

"You never go straight, you go forward," Lydia said. "Like when you drive a car and come to a corner and ask the direction, you never go straight, you go forward."

Despite the societal pressures that encourage gay men and lesbians to remain in the closet, the people interviewed said they do not feel uncomfortable about their sexuality.

"I personally don't feel really any different (than a straight person) except I prefer to have sex with men,"

Chris said.

Dorst said some people are apparently unable to accept her sexuality, and their judgments have been the only problems she has had with being a lesbian.

"One thing that makes me angry is that my abilities and who I am as a person can be totally invalidated by people who know I'm a lesbian," Dorst said. "To me it's no different, it's just no different."

"Gay people can't make themselves straight, and straight people can't make themselves gay," Lydia said. "It's just who you are."

Dorst agreed. "It's just being human," Dorst said.

Tally said. Members of the group listen to each other's problems and offer support. Some of those problems have to do with the child and some have to do with the parent, she said.

"It always helps to know that there are others who have the same frustrations. We need to know that we are OK and are doing our best," Brown said.

Unified School District 383 also has a single parent support group. The group is in a reorganizing stage, said Edie Jorns, director of parent education for the district.

"We put single parents together so they can network and help each other," Jorns said. "We want to build a bridge between the parent and the school."

Parents say it is good to talk and find out they aren't alone, she said.

"You see people get stronger. That certainly affects the children. If the parent is doing well, then the child is doing well, too," Jorns said.

Wefald tells Caucus teaching should be equal to research

By Susan L'Ecuier
Campus Editor

The role of teaching at the University should be valued at least as much as research, said President Jon Wefald during a meeting with the Faculty Women's Caucus Wednesday. "In my personal view, teaching is undervalued and should be valued more," Wefald said to an audience of about 80. "Teaching should be on at least a 50-50 level with research." The caucus expressed several concerns to Wefald including insufficient funding for the KSU Child Development Center, the poor instructor salaries that were described as exploitive in some cases, and slow progress in the establishment of and support for a professional development program for women faculty. The primary concern revealed by a caucus survey, however, was the perception that teaching was undervalued at K-State.

"Perceptions are important," said Phyllis Bixler, professor of English, "especially when different groups with an investment in an enterprise have different perceptions."

Kansas taxpayers are more likely to see teaching as the primary role of the University, and the University does stress excellent teaching in recruiting and fundraising efforts, Bixler said.

"Yet this is not the perception many faculty members have about our institutional commitment to teaching," she said.

For example, a new assistant professor was told by a department head that tenure and promotion depended 97 percent on research, Bixler said.

No one the professor asked refuted the figure.

In another example, Bixler said a department head told another untenured assistant professor that her 11 previous publications weren't enough to achieve tenure and that good teaching was a basic expectation for all faculty. That faculty member left K-State.

"Over and over I have heard bitter statements such as 'How you are perceived as a teacher can hurt you, but it can't help you,'" she said.

Part of the problem is the assumption that anyone can teach, but not everyone can do research, which may partly explain why lower-ranked faculty have the larger teaching burdens, Bixler said.

"The result is a system in which the more you're paid, the less you teach; the more you teach, the less you're paid," she said.

Bixler said the caucus does not devalue research, elaborating on several concerns about research that were revealed in the survey. One concern, she said, was an overemphasis on externally funded research.

"One administrator reportedly said that no one should get tenure who hasn't signed a grant application," Bixler said. "Clearly, this criterion is not equally valid for all fields. Moreover, several faculty were concerned that letting outside business and government determine what kind of research we do can be an infringement on academic freedom."

Most frequently, however, Bixler said she heard complaints about the

Student found beaten to death

By The Collegian Staff

A suspect is in custody in connection with the beating death of a 19-year-old freshman in engineering, whose body was found early Tuesday morning.

The body of Shane D. Harrison of Manhattan, was found in the north alley of the 600 block of Bluemont, according to a statement released from the Riley County Police Department by Capt. Allen Raynor of the Criminal Investigation Division.

John L. Moss, also of Manhattan, was arrested Tuesday in connection with Harrison's death. Raynor said Moss will appear before Judge Paul Miller at 9:30 a.m. today to be charged with second degree murder and robbery.

"Harrison was beaten to death," Raynor said.

Moss is being held in the Riley County Jail. Bond was set Tuesday afternoon at $50,000, according to Raynor's statement.

Moss lives in a building near the location where Harrison's body was found, Raynor said. He declined to say why Moss was a suspect in the slaying.

Police do not have reason to believe that the two men were prior acquaintances, Raynor said.

County Coroner Rick Kaldor pronounced Harrison dead at the scene.

"He was beaten severely," Kaldor said. "The injuries were very severe around and on the head."

Team effort Many contribute skills to treat camel

By Clinton Wolf
Collegian Reporter

Eunice, a female camel, underwent minor surgery Tuesday afternoon at the Veterinary Medicine Complex to drain out abscesses, or infections, around her joints.

Dr. Neil Anderson, one of two surgeons involved in the operation, said the surgery involved cutting open the skin around the camel's left front ankle and removing pus accumulation.

Similar material was drained from around other joints as well. The surgery lasted about 30 minutes, Anderson said.

Dr. James Carpenter, the second surgeon who coordinated the operation, said the camel is suffering from a variety of ailments including a urinary bladder infection, anorexia and multiple abscesses. Carpenter has recently been appointed as head of exotic animal, avian and wildlife medical programs for the College of Veterinary Medicine.

The dromedary, or one-humped camel, was brought in by her owner, an exotic animal breeder in Nicksen. Carpenter said Eunice had been used in races and in nativity scenes.

The camel was under controlled anesthesia similar to that used on humans for about an hour, Anderson said.

Carpenter said four people were present to control the camel when she went under sedation, and eight people were required to position the animal for surgery once she was asleep.

He said although Eunice is reasonably domesticated, she is dangerous because she weighs about 1,240 pounds, stands between 8 and 9 feet tall, and may bite, strike, kick backwards and spit.

"Their spit is interesting because it's not saliva, it's actually a regurgitated bolus (ball of forage)," Carpenter said.

The biggest pre-surgical difficulty was restraining the animal, Carpenter said.

"We need ways to immobilize the animal to reduce the chance of injury to the clinicians, and to the animal itself," he said.

The camel had been treated by the owner's veterinarian for poor eating and intermittent lameness for about three weeks before she was brought to the University, Carpenter said.

Eunice has been at K-State for less than a week, during which time she has been given vitamins to stimulate her appetite and correct any deficiencies. She has also been given antibiotics and anti-inflammatory medication to relieve pain in her joints.

"She seems to be responding favorably to our medication," Carpenter said.

Prior to surgery, doctors performed physical examinations of the camel and conducted blood tests, bacteria cultures and X-rays of the animal. Also, ultrasound, a fairly new non-surgical technique that uses sound waves to produce visual images of an animal's internal organs, was used to look for evidence of pregnancy or internal tissue masses, Carpenter said.

Assisting Carpenter and Anderson during surgery were Dr. Karen Munana, instructor in surgery and medicine, and Teresa Bradley, fourth year student in veterinary medicine who oversaw daily care of the animal.

Anesthesiologists were Dr. David Hodgson and Dr. Rose McMurphy, assistant professors of surgery and medicine. The radiologist in charge of X-rays and ultrasound was Dr. Cynthia Godshalk.

"In many cases it's a real team (effort), it really is," Carpenter said about this type of surgery. "It's hard for one person to know everything about exotic animals."

He said most clinicians in veterinary medicine work with cats, dogs, horses and cattle. They must

Renters' support discussed

By Anne Krauss
Collegian Reporter

A plea for student support of a proposed Manhattan rental inspection program came during a discussion of the program Tuesday.

"This is a chance for students of 1990 to do something for themselves," said Wade Whitmer, freshman in journalism and mass communications and director of the Consumer Relations Board. "They can take part in something that's actually affecting their time at K-State."

The discussion was designed to explain the intent of the program, address some of the concerns surrounding it and encourage student support, Whitmer said.

The proposed program would ensure safe housing by requiring a rental unit to be inspected before a tenant moves in. The inspection would be based on Building Official and Code Administration codes.

Whitmer said the most effective way students can show their support is to attend the citizen's committee meeting from 7 to 9 p.m. Wednesday at the Headquarter Fire Station on the northeast corner of Kimball and Denison avenues.

"We aren't asking anyone to make a speech, just come," Whitmer said. "We need a physical presence to show the committee these people want something done."

This will be the final work session on the proposal before it is submitted to the City Council Tuesday.

"If it passes it will enforce the existing laws, not change them," said Dianne Urban, student attorney.

The proposal would require all residential rental properties to be inspected and registered with the city.

Whitmer said one of the biggest concerns expressed by landlords is the cost of improvements the program might require them to make.

"Basically they're saying, 'We're not up to the code, if you come out and inspect me I won't pass,'" Whitmer said. "Landlords are supposed to have already voluntarily complied with the BOCA codes."

Many tenants fear that if their landlord has high repair costs, that will result in higher rent, which would ultimately limit the housing market, he said.

Whitmer said although it is not a perfect solution, the rental inspection program will be better than existing practices.

Greenspan's economic forecast gloomy

Federal Reserve chairman says inflation accelerating

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan on Tuesday expressed "guarded optimism" that the country can avoid a recession this year, but his warnings on the dangers of accelerating inflation helped send financial markets into a tailspin.

Setting up a potential clash with the administration, Greenspan said the central bank was looking for the economy to grow at a rate far below the one on which the administration based its 1991 budget.

Wall Street, which has been battered this year by rising foreign interest rates, took Greenspan's inflation warnings and growth forecast as further evidence that the central bank is intent on pursuing a tight money policy to battle inflation and thus will not move anytime soon to lower interest rates.

At mid-afternoon, interest rates on long-term government bonds had jumped sharply while the prices, which move in the opposite direction, fell as much as $18 per $1,000 in face value. The Dow Jones industrial average of 30 stocks was down more than 38 points at the close of business.

"We're in an area where (inflation) is in danger of accelerating," Greenspan said in his appearance before a House Banking subcommittee.

He called the performance of inflation so far this year "horrendous" although he said the January's jump in prices was attributable in large part to temporary factors stemming from severe cold in December.

But he said that the risks of higher inflation in the present circumstances were "larger than we should be willing to tolerate."

In the new Fed economic forecast, the central bank projected that the economy, as measured by the gross national product, will grow at an anemic rate of between 1.75 percent and 2 percent this year, the slowest annual growth rate since the 1981-82 recession.

The Bush administration, in a forecast released last month with its 1991 budget request, forecast growth almost a full percentage point higher at 2.6 percent, when measured from the fourth quarter of 1989.

The administration also predicted that interest rates would drop sharply from their current levels, a decline that would lower the government's borrowing costs on the $2.9 trillion national debt.

With the Fed expected to keep interest rates high to restrain inflationary pressures, economists said both the administration's growth and interest rate assumptions would prove to be too optimistic, thus ballooning the federal budget deficit by billions of dollars.

From June through December, the central bank had been gradually easing short-term interest rates out of concern that weakness in the economy might spell the recovery.

Finnish banks remain closed

HELSINKI, Finland — With banks closed for the third week, Finns are learning to live without cash — or with bags of it. Commercial, savings and deposit banks were shut Feb. 1 in a wage dispute that has been unusual in its intensity for this Scandinavian country known for quiet negotiation and consensus. Only the Post Office bank, which has its own union, remained open.

The cash flow problems are causing many small businesses to suffer, and many layoffs are looming.

Bank customers had plenty of warning before the financial institutions actually closed their doors, and most took precautions.

"When I knew the banks were going to shut I withdrew all my money and keep it in a box at home," said office worker Kaisa Harris. "But with all that cash lying around, I'm actually spending more than I would normally."

Supermarket-owner Veikko Still, unable to deposit his daily receipts, said he carries around bags filled with money to pay his 70 employees.

"Often we have up to a million marks ($250,000) in cloth bags," according to Still, who adds that he has tripled his insurance and increased security.

Cubans die in escape effort

ISLAMORADA, Fla. (AP) — Four Cubans died while trying to escape their homeland in rafts, the Coast Guard said Tuesday.

Two men died at sea and their bodies were thrown overboard by companions, Coast Guard officials said. A third disappeared overnight and a teen-age boy was dead by the time he reached a Florida Keys hospital.

Five people aboard the same rafts survived the voyage.

"It's a hazardous trip, very dangerous," Coast Guard spokesman Luis Diaz said. "At this time of year, the waters are much colder, and exposure has to be a factor."

The journey can take several days by raft. "The longer they are out there, the more dangerous it is," Diaz said.

Diaz said the Cubans, the latest of dozens this year who have tried the 100-mile-plus journey, were in two groups on rafts. Both were spotted at about 8:30 a.m. Tuesday.

Insects could fight cocaine

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration is pushing research into a possible new combatant in the war against cocaine — a caterpillar with a taste for coca leaves — but officials said Tuesday that the insects won't be deployed in South America unless local governments approve.

"We are not undertaking any biological war," said President Bush's spokesman, Martin Fitzwater. "Neither troops nor caterpillars will go in without prior request and consultation."

Peruvian and Bolivian growers supply the vast majority of the world's coca leaves, the raw material for cocaine.

The embassies of Peru and Bolivia did not respond to several requests for comment on the proposal, first reported by the Washington Post in Tuesday's editions.

The administration's drug budget proposal for the Agricultural Research Service for fiscal 1991, starting Oct. 1, is $6.5 million, a $5 million increase over the $1.5 million to be spent this year.

The principal focus of that research is the malumbia, a white moth that, when it is still in its caterpillar stages, eats coca plant leaves, officials said.

"This is quite a voracious caterpillar," Waldemar Klassen, associate deputy administrator for the ARS, told the Post.

Court rules to jail parent

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court ruled Tuesday that parents suspected of child abuse sometimes may be jailed indefinitely for refusing to disclose the whereabouts of their children.

Voting 7-2, the justices permitted the indefinite jailing of a Maryland woman for refusing to tell authorities where her young son can be found. The boy is feared dead.

Society's interest in protecting the boy from harm prevails over the mother's claim that her right against self-incrimination will be violated if she is forced to reveal the child's location, the court said.

Although narrowly written, the ruling could provide a new weapon for officials seeking to protect children from parental abuse.

Youth sentenced in slaying

TOPEKA (AP) — A 16-year-old who pleaded guilty to taking part in the slaying of businessman Paul Bramlage was ordered Tuesday to a detention center until he turns 21.

Anthony E. Clark was given the maximum possible sentence by Judge Daniel Mitchell. Under state law, he could be kept no longer in the Youth Center of Topeka.

Clark pleaded guilty on Feb. 7 to first-degree murder and attempted aggravated robbery.

Bramlage, 37, of Leawood was killed early Jan. 30 outside a Topeka apartment building he owned.

Two other juveniles, one 14 and the other 15, were also charged. One of the cases has been resolved, but assistant district attorney Jean Schmidt has said she could not say how because of the teen's age.

The other teen's case is still scheduled for trial.

A 17-year-old was also arrested. He has not been charged with the homicide, but with an unrelated robbery that took place after Bramlage was killed.

The prosecutor said Clark and three other juveniles armed themselves with several guns and went to the apartment complex planning to fight another group. When there was no sign of the other group, Clark and the others decided to rob someone.

Bramlage was the son of Fred Bramlage, a Junction City developer and a major benefactor of K-State.

Bill's success doubted

TOPEKA (AP) — Prospects are not bright for two bills that would require parental notification when teen-age girls seek abortions.

The chairman of the House Federal and State Affairs Committee, Rep. Ginger Barr, R-Auburn, said Tuesday after hearings on the two bills concluded that she doubted either would make it out of committee, if committee members remained free of pressure from the House leadership.

Barr said there were some swing votes on the committee and that those members could vote the bill out of committee if the leadership told them to do so.

The one bill under consideration, sponsored by Rep. Artie Lucas, R-Highland, would require doctors to make a diligent effort to notify both parents if their daughter under 18 sought an abortion. Doctors would have to wait 48 hours after giving notice before performing the abortion.

Another bill, proposed by Gov. Mike Hayden, would require doctors to notify one parent of a girl 16 and younger. If the girl objected, she could petition a district court judge to waive the notification requirement.

Students mix books, bars to learn

By Lori Antrim
Staff Reporter

It's a student's dream come true, an afternoon class that meets in Aggieville instead of Cardwell Hall.

A class being offered this semester by a local campus group might make its participants the best bottle-flipping, drink-shaking bartenders this side of a Horny Bull.

A Horny Bull is one of the drinks people learn to make in "Bartending 101," a class sponsored by the local chapter of the Association of Collegiate Entrepreneurs, said Andre Angle, president of ACE.

The class was organized by the local chapter to raise money for them to attend the ACE national convention in Atlanta, Angle said.

The class meets at Rusty's Outback behind Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon. Two different seven-week sessions are taught, Angle said. Both sessions are from 4 to 5 p.m. One meets on Monday and Wednesday nights, and the other meets on Tuesday and Thursday nights. It costs $39.95 to enroll in the class. Each session has an enrollment of 25 students.

Phil Jordan, junior in architecture and bartender at Last Chance, explains to bartending students how to cut fruit for drinks.

Some of the topics that are covered include bar setup, how to pour a drink and different methods of mixing drinks, Angle said. Guest lectures are also featured during the class. Bill Arck who is the director of alcohol awareness programs on campus will lecture on alcohol awareness. Rusty Wilson, the owner of Last Chance, will talk about some of the things that are involved in owning a bar, including liability.

Angle said the course was first taught at Pennsylvania State University in University Park, Penn. Students at Penn State can earn college credit for the course.

The idea was so popular at Penn State that the ACE group at Colorado State University in Fort Collins, Colo., also decided to teach the class, said Alan Trul, president of the CSU chapter of ACE. The club has a local bar for a sponsor. Trul said they also started the class to raise money to attend the ACE convention. So far the group has raised $5,000.

The book and tests used in the Penn State course are being used by the other ACE groups, Angle said. Neither K-State nor CSU offers the course for college credit.

"A lot of people under 21 want to take the class," Angle said. "But, we use colored water to avoid any legal

Annual event lacks funding

Flinthills Festival cancelled; organizations unsupportive

By Melissa Simpson
Staff Reporter

A lack of funds has caused the Flinthills Festival Association to cancel the annual festival in 1990.

Byron Whetstone, 1990 festival chairman, said the association made a decision which is virtually final in canceling the festival, unless someone comes forward to underwrite the festival.

The association was unsuccessful in raising $20,000 by last Friday.

"The association targeted a small number of businesses in the private sector of Manhattan to underwrite the festival, and we were unsuccessful in raising that money," Whetstone said. "The businesses and organizations that support other festivals in the state didn't come forward to allow the festival to occur a third year."

The Flinthills Festival features arts and crafts, art shows, live entertainment, food booths and folk life demonstrations for three days. It relies on monetary resources from the city, USD 383, the University, the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and the Manhattan Arts Council.

Ron Fehr, assistant director of parks and recreation, said the festival lost about $20,000 in 1989, and the parks and recreation department had allocated a festival budget of $90,000 in 1989.

"The funding provides the entertainment, rental for the tents and improvements to the park, such as transferring electricity to the people throughout the park," Fehr said. "The people that collected tickets were paid out of the budget, and there was also a Flinthills Festival coordinator who was paid out of the budget."

Fehr said the original goal of the festival was to enhance the community with a high quality festival. He also said the festival drew a large crowd from the area, but in order to make the 1990 festival a reality, the parks and recreation department would have to increase the admission fee considerably.

Personality clashes discussed at meeting

By Chris Koger
Government Editor

Past and present Student Senate and Student Governing Association members attended a special Senate meeting Tuesday to discuss recent problems and personality clashes during meetings of the governing body.

During last week's meeting, Senate indefinitely postponed Student Body President Todd Johnson's appointments to Tribunal after a discussion concerning the appointees' qualifications.

Senate Chairman Chris Kern requested the meeting Monday, and invited several past Senate members to offer insight on the senate process and cooperation during the meetings.

Troy Lubbers, past student body president and Associated Students of Kansas chairman, said the new senators should learn the system by studying the Senate standing rules, by-laws and constitution.

"Find out what you can do and can't do," Lubbers said, referring to recent meetings where debate and questioning periods were slowed by concerns of procedural matters.

Lubbers said the senators should communicate both in and out of the meetings.

"If you don't know who you're working with, you can't be the best senator you can," he said.

Bernie Giefer, a past senator who has since graduated, said personalities should not interfere with the senators' decisions.

"(Bills) should go through on an issue basis, not a personal basis," Giefer said. "If you start taking vendettas on people, you are not really listening to what they are trying to say."

He said Johnson's appointments to Tribunal are different from other

Karmic harmony discovered on walk

I went wandering one afternoon. I attempted to forego applying a purpose to my travels. I allowed my feet and my eyes to guide me. I trailed off the worn path. I focused my eyes outward. And focused my mind inward. A reflective depression gripped me like a melody, and I walked in its rhythm.

My thoughts cycled. Over and over and over again, I could think of nothing else...

I still feel like a child who, while frustrated and envious of authority, is utterly dependent on authority's directive force and on authority's approving glance. For so long, I have believed that adults are immune to insecurities and instability; that my struggles will dissipate at some magical moment out in the working world, and I, too, will be able to position myself securely in stone.

Now I see that what I term instability is not a weakness, but the presence of growth and creativity. Stability and security (all those promised conditions of adulthood) may be the exact opposites of peace.

Security is not an achievable condition. If I work to attain security, I will always be working up the ladder instead of resting on some hilltop with a view and a vision not disrupted by threats, competition and envy. If my goal is to attain and acquire, when will I have enough (i.e., goods, luxuries, love) to feel secure? Material goods are temporary. People are temporary. Positions are temporary.

But if I accept that security is not an attainable goal, this is contrary to the values engrained within me. I am patterned according to individualism; most of us are. This ideology consists of these beliefs: that achievement occurs because of a person's ability, discipline and hunger for achievement; that happiness, wealth, love, etc. are scarce resources, and if I work hard, I will be fulfilled by them; and that I must depend only upon myself, concentrating on my goals, my needs — self reliance.

But because of these beliefs, I am inclined to disconnect from others. Community and relationships can become bothersome. Needing someone becomes a sick, dependent impulse. Security as defined by individualism must be attained by means of achievement and status; security within relationships, within human connections, is seen as secondary, even as a hindrance.

Jana Leep

COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

If I continue to adhere to individualism, I fear I will have to cling to the ladder even if I am unable to climb further — that I will accept a lack of fulfillment as the extent of fulfillment — that I will settle into a comfortable pattern of mediocrity — that I will continually be vulnerable to threats to my position, my control over that one rung on the ladder — that I will appear secure and stable but will be filled with paranoia and unfulfillment.

My thoughts continued to weave around and between each other — until I was woven within a cocoon, wanting to unravel the threads. I leaned back against a tree and watched the simultaneous exchange of light as the sun went down, allowing the moon's white light to grow more distinct in the darkening sky. I felt a similar exchange within myself ....

Time is a scarce resource. I scurry around as we all do, watching our watches. Time has acquired an economic facet that now directs our use of time. How can we spend our time profitably? How can we not to waste our time? Some would say I am wasting my time reflecting about time. Some would say that an afternoon spent in the park is a waste of time especially when mulling about questions that have no answers. But as a college student, and I would guess this holds true for professors, administrators, businesswomen and men, parents, etc., that even if I plan and "calendarize" my life, I am never without a deadline — some book to be read, some letter to write. What if I achieve my goals, mark off each item on my checklist, but then am without the time and energy to slow down, to step back and enjoy the fullness of life?

I want to be able to have a committed relationship — but the question is how to balance relationship with work. I want to be able to have children and care for them — but the contemporary question is — when? I want to be able to care for my grandmother as she grows older and dependent — but how financially, and how when I have goals and visions of a career and a family? Economic imperatives dictate every aspect of our lives — how we invest our time and energy. Our priorities are structured according to these economic imperatives and according to individualism. Yet, I have a feeling the most rewarding aspects of my life will involve family, connections and community. I wonder if a collective-orientated society that fostered commonality and diversity would perhaps be more beneficial to its members and more productive for its members. I must find a balance ... We must find a balance ....

The afternoon had become evening and the darkness prompted my departure. But before following my feet home, I became aware of a new sensation. I moved with much more ease. Simply allowing myself the time to lean against the tree, to wander through my mind, led me to a quiet place of peace. I had not discovered answers to my inquiries, but I had cleared a new path, a path at times parallel to the worn path of earlier generations, but yet veering away from the worn path as well ...

Washington vacation waste of student funds

Student Senate will vote on a bill Thursday night to allocate $1,507.10 so Student Body President Todd Johnson, ASK board chairman Troy Lubbers and a yet-to-be-named ASK campus director can spend their spring break in Washington D.C.

Of course, they are going there to help lobby for the University. They also said they won't enjoy themselves.

"I'd just as soon go to Florida," Johnson was heard to utter at a recent Senate meeting.

Maybe that's where Johnson and the others should go and save the students some money. This trip is a waste of time and money. It is just a junket for student bureaucrats-in-training to get some real-world experience in taking useless trips with public monies.

What is to be accomplished on this trip? It's hard to get a straight answer to that question. One thing that can be said is the money could be better spent sending student lobbyists to Topeka, where the vast majority of the University's funding comes from. A sum of $1,507.10 could pay for many trips to the Capitol to get legislators to listen to our needs.

Johnson has made lobbying a priority of his administration and he has done a good job so far. But he should also understand what the term "cost effective" means. This Washington trip is much too expensive compared to the possible benefits to be gained. It is not a good idea.

Theories can coexist

Uh, oh, here we go again. I believe in God. I don't know why, but I do. But I also believe in evolution.

How can this be? I'm not sure. Nevertheless, in my unsubstantiated opinion, both exist. The only way to explain the double existence, it seems, would be to say God had some sort of influence on evolution. At any rate, the problem with this double belief is that I tend to get riled if anyone claims either is bunk.

I had a friend when I was young who, when he found out that I believed in evolution, condemned me to hell, then went home and told his mom that I was an atheist. His mom called my mom and told her I was lacking religious guidance. Why?

Why is it people would have you think evolution and God are exact opposites — that you can only believe in one or the other?

As fate would have it, some Jehovah's Witnesses showed up at my door last night and gave me their spiel. Jehovah's Witnesses, incidentally, believe that evolution, and the study or belief thereof, is sinful — the devil's attempt to lead us astray.

There is nothing wrong with the Jehovah's Witnesses believing this. But since their representatives imposed this belief on me, and wanted me to change my belief, I couldn't help but wonder why they thought evolution is so sinful.

I listened to them, accepted the literature they gave me, and even re-evaluated my own belief. I compared theirs to mine. I wanted to see if the Jehovah's Witnesses had any valid arguments against evolution.

Many comedians have poked fun at Jehovah's Witnesses, either because of their belief, or their method of evangelism. When they asked Saturday Night Live's Dennis Miller if he wouldn't rather "live in eternal peace at Jehovah's hand," he replied, "Well, not if it's with a bunch of Jehovah's Witnesses! And where do you get off telling me how to live ... I ask of thee."

I couldn't have brought myself to say such a thing to my Jehovah's Witnesses, even if they had asked me a similar question. And they didn't. Really, the visit was not a bad experience.

The only thing that irritated me about the visit was that I had to stand there with the door open, letting all the heat out. Now the electric company will want more dough to make more electricity, to make more heat. The electric company ought to have Jay Leno as a spokesman — "Heat all you want, we'll make more!" (evil laugh).

John Mussman

I felt sorry for one of the women, because her sales pitch sounded rehearsed. Speech-making is hell. Back in Public Speaking 1A, I could be totally up on my speech topic but things just would not come out right. So I could sympathize with the women at my door.

However, the two women lost me when they scoffed the stupidity of "having a monkey for an ancestor." My ancestor was an ape, not a monkey. The lack of correct terminology made me lose faith in their speech, so I fell back to reading the literature they gave me.

People can believe what they want. It's just that I don't get it. How can you deny evolution? The facts are there. But then, how can you deny God? The facts are there, also. We had to get here somehow, so the two must not, then, be opposite entities.

But no big deal, I just went on to read the nicely printed magazine entitled "Fraud in Science." It dealt with the absurdities of evolution in a way the rest of us scurvy science-loving dogs could understand.

The cover story railed on Discover magazine columnist Steven Jay Gould. He's a pretty good columnist who frequently covers evolution.

"Fraud in Science" mentioned a few sins involved with believing in evolution and claimed that science was the exact opposite of God. Then it proceeded to quote almost every passage from Gould's column.

The story never actually stated this in so many words, but thou just kneweth the Gould quotes were to be read with a skeptical eye, and that an "incredulous chuckle" was to be inserted after every one. This didn't disprove evolution, but rather merely injured the validity of the magazine.

Another story talked about the "Wonderful Human Ear." It explained how it worked, what a miracle it was that the tiny eardrum could pick up the slightest noise, and that sound impulses are converted into a special code for transmission to the brain. It mentioned that the process was sort of like how Voyager beamed those wonderful pictures back to Earth. Neat!

But how could we even think, the story asked, that this tiny wonder happened just by chance, given its miraculous complexity. It could only have been created by the hand of Jehovah.

Well sure. I sayeth not that God didn't create the wonderful organ.

But did he have to create it from scratch? God may be perfect, but even He might have wanted to make a rough draft. Especially when creating a human being. A possible scenario ...

First a history recap: On the first few days, God in his divine power said, "Let there be all that first stuff so we can have a place to put all the later stuff," and it was done. Later He said unto the new Earth, "Let there be all the later stuff," and that was done too. Clear?

Now, here's some speculation: What if ... Somewhere in between the first day and the day the animals arrived, God made all the amoebas and all the DNA. Then God said, "DNA, mutate!" and so it was done. God said, "Mutate in the way I command of thee," and God commanded the amoebas DNA to mutate into an animal.

But God had planned ahead, like he is inclined to do, and the DNA mutated into several different kinds of animals. Including apes, dinosaurs, birds, bees, and Joe namah it.

Soon, God said unto the apes' DNA, "Mutate into a man, and call him Adam." And so that was done, which, after the addition of Eve, brings us to the present.

And on the seventh day, which apparently (still speculating, mind thee) we are still in, God rested. And He watched over his flock.

Okay, maybe that's not the way it happened. I don't really believe that exact story myself. But why not? Is there something in the Bible that explicitly states that God had nothing to do with evolution? Genesis speaks of creation, but it does not deny creation may have been a guided evolutionary process.

Maybe belief in evolution instead of God is sinful. That I can agree with. But, it's not like God and evolution are mutually exclusive — as if evolution was synonymous with Satan.

In the indirectly quoted immortal words of Brad Seabourn, "I want proof, dammit!"

HAZARDS IN THE HOME

State and local government officials are trying to defuse an environmental time bomb that is threatening the safety of many Kansas residents.

The threat primarily involves chemical cleaners, pesticides and other hazardous materials stored in homes across the state. Unfortunately, many residents are unaware of the hazards posed by storing these types of chemicals.

"Household hazardous waste is just another component of the solid waste problem that people have ignored for quite some time," said Riley County Planning Director Monty Wedel. "We've never been able to tell people what to do with this stuff."

According to the Environmental Protection Agency, a substance is considered hazardous if it is corrosive, toxic or flammable. Substances are also considered hazardous if they are reactive or explosive when mixed with other substances.

The EPA lists a number of items commonly stored in homes which are considered hazardous. These include refinishing products, pesticides, cleaning solvents and automobile fluids and batteries.

In 1989, the Kansas Legislature appropriated $150,000 in general funds to provide a means for proper disposal of these materials. The funds will be awarded to local governments seeking to establish household hazardous waste collection programs.

The Kansas Department of Health and Environment in December established a grant program designed to further assist local governments in implementing these programs.

If a local program is selected, under terms of the state program, as much as half the local governments' cost of collecting the materials will be covered, said Kathleen Warren, state program director.

Funds will be awarded on a competitive basis and in the form of grants, she said.

"We've been contacted by about 60 local governments," Warren said. "There may be as many as 10 receiving grants."

Wedel said the county is seeking about $30,000 of the state funds.

If Riley County is successful in its bid to secure a state grant, total local program funding would be about $60,000, he said.

Wedel said Riley County has needed a household hazardous waste collection program for some time.

Hazardous materials account for about 1 percent of the 110 tons of trash deposited in the Riley County Landfill each day, Wedel said.

"If you want to multiply that out, that's quite a bit," he said.

Dumping such materials into the county landfill only adds to the area's environmental risk because the landfill was not designed to hold hazardous waste, Wedel said.

Although the program is still in the planning stages, county officials expect to schedule the first collection day for sometime in April, he said.

The county considered implementing a regional collection program, but decided against it because officials had doubts regarding how far people would travel to dispose of materials, Wedel said.

In addition to collection programs, the state funds will support educational programs, which officials hope will also contribute towards reducing the amount of hazardous materials in homes, Warren said.

"The expense of collecting these materials depends on education," Wedel said. "We hope people will only buy what they really need."

According to a Water Pollution Control Federation publication, every home in the United States contains three to 10 gallons of materials that are hazardous to human health or harmful to the environment.

The publication also states that people can effectively reduce the amount of hazardous materials in their homes by understanding label directions, avoiding a surplus of substances and disposing of the substances properly.

'Cats nab sole possession of 4th place

K-State center Tony Massop blocks the way of Oklahoma State's Royce Jeffries, as Jeffries tries to get off a shot Tuesday night in the Wildcats' 66-60 victory over the Cowboys in Bramlage Coliseum.

Wildcats look to have inside track to NCAA tourney berth with victory

By Scott Paske
Sports Reporter

Freshman Askia Jones is making a habit of adding the right elements to a K-State basketball game.

Saturday, Jones provided excitement with a desperation three-pointer at the buzzer to give the Wildcats a much-needed road victory at Iowa State.

Tuesday against Oklahoma State, the San Antonio, Texas, native added second-half finesse to a physical contest and sparked K-State to a comeback from behind 66-60 win over the Cowboys at Bramlage Coliseum.

The victory moved the 'Cats into sole possession of fourth place in the Big Eight Conference race with three games remaining at 16-11 overall and 6-5 in league play. O-State fell to 14-10 and 5-6.

Jones helped bring K-State back from a nine-point deficit in the final 15 minutes by scoring 15 of his 17 points in the second half. His 8-footer in the lane with 10:19 remaining tied the game for the first time since the opening tip-off at 44-44.

He followed with an 18-footer from the baseline to give the 'Cats the lead for good at the 6:13 mark, 52-50.

"They were overplaying Steve (Henson) and Jean (Derouillere) in the second half, and I would be the one with the open shot," Jones said. "Since I was the open man, I decided to knock down the rhythm jumper and it felt good."

Jones was definitely in rhythm with his shot, hitting 6-of-7 attempts after intermission. But it was his passing that helped the 'Cats put the Cowboys away. After a timeout with just over three minutes remaining, Jones penetrated to the middle of the floor and found Henson alone on the right wing. Henson, who led K-State with 18 points, hit from three-point range to give the 'Cats a 57-53 lead.

"Our defense was pretty solid up to a point in the second half," O-State coach Leonard Hamilton said. "But I thought they did a very good job of penetrating our man-to-man and breaking us down."

In the first half, both teams broke each other down with rugged inside play.

K-State's recurring shooting woes enabled the Cowboys to build a 21-10 lead in the first 10½ minutes of the game. The 'Cats, who shot 29.6 percent from the field in the first half, made just two of their first 12 shots.

A collapsing post defense kept K-State from being blown out. The 'Cats held Cowboy sophomore Byron Houston, the team's leading scorer, in check with four first-half points and nine for the game.

"K-State did a very good job of keeping the ball away from him," Hamilton said. "They do a great job of helping each other."

O-State forward Royce Jeffries, who scored 16 points, agreed.

"K-State was very physical inside," Jeffries said. "We felt like we were getting mugged out there, but who knows? We'll watch the films and find out."

The inside battle escalated into a near-brawl midway through the first half. Houston, who was whistled for his second foul at the 8:06 mark, fell to the floor after 'Cat forward Lance Simmons hit him with an elbow to the throat.

After Hamilton was issued a technical foul by referee Rick Wulkow for protesting the call, Houston and Simmons exchanged words. The O-State coach put Houston on the bench for the remainder of the half.

"Nobody said any elbow was thrown," Hamilton said. "He had a lot of trouble breathing and the doctor said he wasn't so sure he would be able to play in the second half."

"Byron was kind of down emotionally after all of that happened, and he wanted revenge in the second half," Jeffries said. "He wasn't really able to get it, but I'm really proud of him for the way he hung in there."

Henson made both technical free throws, but Jeffries converted a K-State possession into a steal and dunk with 7:55 remaining to give O-State a 23-14 lead.

The Cowboys led 31-25 at intermission.

Derouillere and Tony Massop joined Henson and Jones in double figures with 12 and 10 points respectively. Guard Darwyn Alexander led O-State with 18.

Hoops talent overflowing in Kansas junior college ranks

Scott Paske

Chalk Talk

With another edition of March Madness just around the corner, I'm sure one of the last things on K-State coach Lon Kruger's mind is who will fill the vacancies that five seniors will leave at the end of the season.

I've been looking out for you, Coach.

I went to a junior college basketball game Saturday night, which isn't a big deal, unless you're into seeing some of major college basketball's finest future talent. After watching Butler County, ranked 10th in the country, beat Barton County, 114-89, I left with a greater understanding of what Kruger and other college coaches see in the juco ranks.

There are several "diamonds in the rough" playing at two-year schools, especially here in Kansas. The Jayhawk Conference, which includes schools within the state, has been recognized as a hotbed for eventual NCAA stars. Other regions with similar reputations include Texas and Florida.

Since Kruger accepted the head coaching position in 1986, the juco movement has been in full swing at K-State. Mitch Richmond, Fred McCoy, Charles Bledsoe, Will Scott, LaKeith Humphrey and Carlos Diggins are a sample of former players who made stops at junior colleges before arriving in Manhattan.

This year's roster includes juco standouts Reggie Britt, Billy Ray Smith, Jean Derouillere, Jeff Wires and Keith Amerson.

Kansas jocos are loaded with talent again this season, including two players who signed with K-State a year ago. Allen County freshman J.R. Rider, who signed with K-State in November of 1988 but failed to graduate from Encinal High School in Alameda, Calif., is leading the Jay-hawk Conference in scoring at 30.2 points per game.

The other Wildcat signee, Kent Bennett, is attending Butler County, but a knee injury has kept him out of action this season.

Butler County, coached by former Wichita State standout Randy Smithson, has two Division I prospects in Herbert Jones and Val Barnes. Jones, a sophomore from Atlanta, is averaging 26.4 points and surpassed Carlos Diggins as the Grizzlies' all-time leading scorer earlier this season.

Barnes, who led Wichita South to consecutive Class 6A state titles, has given Smithson the outside punch to vault BCCC into first place in the Jayhawk's West division. He is averaging 18.2 points per game.

Barton County, the former school of LaKeith Humphrey and current Oklahoma player Jackie Jones, has one of the region's top guard prospects in Mark Bell. Bell, a 5-foot-8 freshman from Louisville, Ky., is fifth on the Jayhawk scoring list at 21.8.

In the first half against Butler, Bell hit seven consecutive field goals, including four three-pointers with defenders in his face.

Cowley County has a high-scoring tandem in Kent Murphree and Tony Windless. Murphree (23.8) is a former standout at Arkansas City High School. Windless (22.5) had a five-game stretch earlier this season in which he averaged over 33 points per game.

Hutchinson, coached by former Western Kentucky assistant Dave Farrar, was ranked ninth in the National Junior College Athletic Association poll this week. The Blue Dragons, winners of the 1988 NJCAA Tournament, are led by sophomores Corey Floyd and Paul Stallworth. Hutch, in a league known for its fast-breaking style, features one of the nation's top defensive teams.

Butler and Hutch meet tonight at the Hutchinson Sports Arena to decide the Jayhawk West championship.

Track:

K-State all-American decathlete Steve Fritz competed in the National TAC Pentathlon Sunday at Baton Rouge, La., placing second with 4,033 points, the top point total for a collegiate athlete at the meet.

Fritz was outdistanced by former all-American Vernon George's 4,171 points.

Also competing for K-State was Terry VanLaningham, who finished seventh with 3,530 points.

Basketball:

Monday, K-State coach Lon Kruger was named head coach of the North squad for this summer's U.S. Olympic Festival, which will take place in Minneapolis in July.

Other coaches will be Louisiana State's Dale Brown (South), Princeton's Pete Carril (East), and Oregon's Don Monson (West).

Kruger is also the NCAA representative on USA Basketball's Games Committee that evaluates players from the United States for all international competition.

Kruger's assistants for the festival will be Bob Hanson of the University of Nebraska-Omaha and Dan Hays of Oklahoma Christian College.

Lady Cats could clinch tie for title

By David Svoboda
Sports Reporter

The trip to the title runs through Stillwater, Okla.

For the Lady Cats, 10-2 in Big Eight play and 18-7 overall, a win tonight against third-place Oklahoma State on the Cowgirls' home floor clinches a tie for the Big Eight Conference crown.

Put that together with a win over Kansas Saturday night in Bramlage Coliseum, and you get the first outright championship the team has had since 1983, the year round-robin play began in women's competition to determine a regular-season champ.

Don't think — not even for a moment — interim coach Gaye Griffin and her team don't know what will happen if they win tonight and Saturday.

Also, don't think — not even for a second — this team wants to share its title with any other team.

Griffin made the point crystal clear.

"I told the players, 'when you're a child, your parents make you share everything. I'm your coach, and I don't want you to share with anybody,'" Griffin said.

That healthy selfishness might be just what the Lady Cats need.

The road contest in Gallagher-Iba Arena won't be a walk in the park. The Cowgirls are 8-4 in league play.

The Lady Cats have won all three of their road games against those teams in the conference's second division, but have gained but one win over the other four teams that join them with league marks above .500.

In fact, recent road losses against second-place Missouri and third-place Colorado (tied with OSU and Kansas) haven't been close. The Tigers beat K-State 79-64, and the Lady Buffs downed the Lady Cats 82-69.

Griffin said past road woes shouldn't be a problem — not with a championship so close to her team's grasp.

"If the players don't realize what they're playing for, we've got a problem," Griffin said. "We need to come out early and establish something in Oklahoma State's mind. Whether we're down 8-2 or tied, if we've played well, we can set a tone that tells them we've come to play."

Griffin said K-State's recent problems on the road and tough games in Bramlage were the result of the team's early-season successes.

"What people don't understand right now is that people are out to get us," she said.

Last season, after going 6-2 in the first eight conference games, the Lady Cats staggered home down the stretch, losing five of their last six regular-season Big Eight games.

In so doing, the team lost its chance to finish second in the league, and fell into a third-place tie with Missouri. It might be tempting to give the team a history lesson.

But Griffin is having no part of it, even though Oklahoma State drove a dagger into the K-State heart twice in the last three games in 1988-89, including once in Stillwater and once in Salina, at the postseason tourney.

"Last year was last year and this year is this year," she said. "I'm not God, and I can't predict what's going to happen, but we will be ready to play."

Griffin said her players are well aware of the challenge that faces them this week. Several have made trips to her office and their feelings have come out in those trips.

"The good part about them coming in is that it shows they're excited," Griffin said. "They want to win this championship all alone. This is their week, and hopefully they're ready to shine."

Tuesday, the Lady Cats cracked the top 30 in the national women's basketball coaches poll, which is conducted by Hal Greenburg of the Philadelphia Inquirer. K-State received 25 votes and is ranked 29th.

Big Eight Conference Standings

	Big 8	Pct.	Total	Pct.
Lady Cats	10-2	.833	18-7	.720
Missouri	9-3	.750	18-7	.720
Kansas	8-4	.666	19-7	.730
Oklahoma St.	8-4	.666	16-9	.640
Colorado	8-4	.666	15-10	.600
Iowa State	2-10	.166	12-13	.480
Nebraska	2-10	.166	10-15	.400
Oklahoma	1-11	.083	5-20	.200

Senior Elyse Funk and the rest of the Lady Cats can clinch at least a tie for the Big Eight title with a victory at Oklahoma State tonight.

Faculty, students to gain hands-on computer skills

By Shannan Seely
Collegian Reporter

College of Education graduate students will show interested faculty and students current computer techniques on Thursday and Friday in Bluemont 16.

Participants in "Multi-Media: Moving Toward the 21st Century" workshops will learn how to use computers for dissertations, publications and other projects. The 10 workshops will also give participants hands-on computer experience.

Veronica McEachin, graduate student in curriculum and instruction and workshop co-chairwoman, said the workshops are the first of their kind because the presenters will be only graduate students and not faculty members. McEachin is a member of the organization sponsoring the classes, Teacher Education Graduate Students.

The organization decided to target the workshops to not only students but also faculty, because many techniques are new to them, McEachin said.

The presenters are "top students within the education department dealing with computers," McEachin said. "They are the experts without the doctorate degree."

Because the classes are limited, College of Education graduate students and faculty must sign up in the media center in Bluemont 16. Classes not filled will be open to all faculty and students Thursday and Friday.

"Everyone in every college should know about it," said Terita Gusby, graduate student and co-chairperson. "It is open to the University — all people in all fields of study."

Thursday, four workshops are available. At 9 a.m., McEachin will present an introduction to Guide.

Also at 9 a.m., Tom Sextro will explain Appleworks. Another graduate student, Yusup Bin Hashim, will explain MacPaint, a computer program for creating graphics.

Frank Smith will demonstrate the use of Bitmail and main-frame access at 2 p.m. John Hogue will introduce participants to Hypercard, a program useful in the field of education, at 2 p.m.

The first Friday class will begin at 9 a.m. Kent Unruh will inform participants how Apple IIe/Gs work. A session focusing on increasing creativity in the design of publications or messages will be explained by Mary Hammel. This session will be available at 10 a.m. and 3 p.m.

Other workshops on Friday include word processing, to be presented by John Brungardt, and Kathy Hueser will explain the role of visuals in the visual education workshop at two times, 9 a.m. and 2 p.m.

Steve McDermit will present an introduction to the telecommunications process at 2 p.m.

'The Seven Samurai' depicts village life

Mark Schreiner

REVIEW

If "The Magnificent Seven" is a Western, then "The Seven Samurai" is an Eastern.

"The Seven Samurai," released in 1954, served as a model for "The Magnificent Seven" and other Westerns. Directed by Akira Kurosawa, the epic details the fight of a farming village in 16th-century Japan against a marauding band of brigands.

The villagers have a hard life. They don't eat rice; they eat millet. "Land tax! Forced labor! Drought! Then the brigands!" complains one old woman as she buries her face in the dirt and cries with the rest of the village. "Is there no God to save us?"

The God who saves them is Kambei, a samurai, a knight errant, a Japanese hired gun. The town's patriarch, who closely resembles Yoda from the "Star Wars" movies, hires him and six other samurai. The wages: three square meals apiece.

The interview process when hiring the seven takes forever. Kambei tells potential samurai, "I'm going to fight a war that promises neither fame nor reward." Still, he finds takers, but just as in "The Dirty Dozen," they are the grungiest and hungriest.

What follows is the longest girding-for-battle sequence I've ever seen. Instead of the usual quick cocking of guns, strapping of helmets and whetting of knives, we watch as a moat and a fence grow around the village.

We watch as the villagers learn to use sharpened bamboo shafts as spears. They are disciplined with spankings and lemmings are scared to lift their heads from the dirt to look at the samurai.

Finally, we see the hour-long battle. We see each of the 40 brigands die, some of them in slow motion.

Most of "The Seven Samurai" passes in slow motion, lasting three and a half hours. While the characters are well-developed and every action that is important to the plot is shown, an awful lot of nothing happens.

We waste time watching Kambei hire his men. We waste time watching each and every brigand die. At least the whole second reel could be chucked without losing anything.

We waste time as the camera focuses on Kambei's face, looking resolute and tough against overwhelming odds. Dialogue is minimal. Like in a Clint Eastwood film, the characters are almost mute, doing little more than assert their pride, grit their teeth and die.

"The Seven Samurai" resembles Westerns in other ways. The subtitles consistently use such terms as "much obliged," "sidekick," "draw," and "showdown." But, instead of boots, the swords of dead samurai stick out of their graves.

Other than its length, "The Seven" ■ See SAMURAI, Page 12

Film shows impact of business on culture

Director creates powerful debut documentary on modern society with biting satire, critique

Mark Butler

REVIEW

Director Michael Moore has fashioned a powerful and memorable essay on modern society with his debut film, "Roger and Me."

"Roger" comes across as a documentary assembled by Woody Allen, but the film's splashes of offbeat humor do nothing to dilute its intended message. The film is an allegory of big business in the United States today and the resounding effect it has on our culture.

Moore mixes biting satire, angry criticism and some personal bias with a dash of camp to create "Roger and Me." He distinguishes himself from other filmmakers by ignoring cinematic convention. Moore combines newsreel footage, videotaped newscasts, interviews and reports of his own to form a quirky yet cohesive whole.

The film, at least on the surface, looks at the effects of massive auto-worker layoffs by General Motors on the town of Flint, Mich. Between harrowing portraits of Flint's decline, Moore tries in vain to track down GM chairman Roger Smith (the "Roger" of the film's title) to bring Smith to Flint.

"Roger" opens with a brief biography of Moore and the symbiotic relationship of GM and Flint. Moore describes through a collage of home movies and GM commercials how the automaker helped make Flint a boomtown during the heyday of the American car. He also describes how both the city and his family became dependent on GM for their well-being.

Moore immediately positions himself as a champion of the auto-worker and a critic of the automaker. He admits he thought Flint was secure until GM announced its series of layoffs and plant closings.

The remainder of the movie traces the effects of GM's decisions on the economy and the citizens of Flint.

Moore draws on a disparate number of sources to make his point.

Singlemindedness marks the director's analysis, yet does not distort the end result. While words can be twisted, pictures cannot lie as easily. Moore lets his cameras illustrate the issues.

Interviews are interspersed throughout the film to let some of those involved give their opinions, but they are often edited to humiliate the subjects. Former Flint resident and "Newlywed Game" host Bob Eubanks tells an anti-Semitic and homophobic joke. A soon-to-be Miss America Kaye Lani Rae Rafko is accosted mid-parade by the film's crew for some tongue-tied self promotion. Former GM spokespersons Pat Boone and Anita Bryant offer some naive advice to Flint citizens.

In light of these unflattering portrayals, it is no wonder the legal staff of "Roger and Me" exceeds the size of some technical crews. Some of the telling interviews are also potentially libelous and damaging. These were included, more or less, for some needed humor.

Conversations with those directly affected by Flint's downfall are more haunting. Moore's conversation with a woman who sells rabbits for "pets or meat" borders on frightening. He also talks to a prison guard who once was a GM worker and is now locking up several co-workers.

A poignant, recurring segment sees Moore follow a sheriff's deputy through a series of evictions of laid-off autoworkers. The filmmaker manages to bring unabashed tragedy to light when he dubs Roger Smith's Christmas message of hopefulness over footage of a family being thrown out of their home on Christmas Eve.

To his credit, Moore's treatment of the common man is far more sensitive than that of the celebrities interviewed.

Media trends focus of panel discussion

Collegian Reporters

Private industry links every community in the United States to international news.

"There are international connections to everything that is done in Manhattan," said Ed Seaton, president of Inter American Press Association and publisher of the Manhattan Mercury, Tuesday during a panel discussion on communication trends.

Karen De Witt, R.M. Seaton Visiting Professional and an editor for USA Today, moderated the panel, titled "Media of the '80s, '90s and Beyond." An audience of about 125 attended the seminar in the K-State Union Little Theatre.

Seaton was one of four speakers on the panel. Other panel members were Michel Marriott, national education reporter for the New York Times; Jacqueline Trescott, feature writer for the Washington Post; and Rae Tyson, an editor and environmental writer for USA Today.

Seaton said a study of United States newspapers revealed that space devoted to international news is one-fifth of what it was in 1972.

Forty-five percent of readers in a recent survey checked very interested in international news when asked what kind of news they were interested in seeing, Seaton said. However, only five percent of editors said they thought their readers were interested in seeing international news.

He said seventy percent of U.S. employees have competition from abroad. Farmers have to monitor

Award-winning play to run tonight

By The Collegian Staff

Daedalus Productions will present Charles Fuller's Pulitzer Prize-winning black drama, "A Soldier's Play," at 8 p.m. Wednesday in McCain Auditorium.

The play, which was adapted into the Hollywood film, "A Soldier's Story," won the Outer Circle Critics Award for Best American Play.

"A Soldier's Play" is a blend of murder, mystery and courtroom drama. It takes place in 1944 at Fort Neal, an Army post in rural Louisiana, where a black man named Vernon C. Waters, sergeant of a black platoon, is shot.

The Defense Department orders an investigation of the murder, which is led by a black officer, Army Lawyer Richard Davenport.

At Fort Neal, Davenport discovers abundant racial tensions, both in the town and on the base itself. Davenport interviews the soldiers who served under Waters, and who reveal an extreme hatred for their sergeant.

As the investigation continues, accepted racial hatreds are stripped away to reveal the real feelings and motives of the suspects. The final discovery of the killer turns out to be even more shattering than the murder itself.

The Daedalus tour of "A Soldier's Play" will be presented throughout the United States, and will run from late January to mid-March with the majority of its performances occurring during February, National Black History Month.

The play is sponsored by the Multicultural Student Council at K-State.

Karen Hester, senior in mathematics, said the play was scheduled to be one of the many activities on campus during Black History Month.

"The members of the Multicul-tural Student Council, which I am president of, decided to book the play," Hester said.

She said the council is comprised of one representative from each multicultural and minority organization on campus.

"This is our first year as a council at K-State," Hester said. "We are here to support multicultural and minority groups and help them with their activities."

CONFERENCE

principal-counselor-student

The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of these high schools to attend the 1990 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with you about your preparation for and experiences in KSU academic programs. Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school faculty. You are welcome to drop by between 10:15 a.m. and 12:15 on Wednesday Feb. 21. This is an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

Center rewrites lodging manual

By Clinton Wolf
Collegian Reporter

K-State's Small Business Development Center is involved in a growing Kansas industry, the bed and breakfast inn.

One of the center's publications, "How to Start and Operate a Bed and Breakfast," has recently been rewritten and expanded as part of a U.S. Small Business Administration program. This is the third publication the SBDC has produced for the administration.

Frederick Rice, SBDC director, wrote the manual. In it he defines a bed and breakfast as a place "where a guest is provided a bed for the night and a breakfast before departing the following morning."

According to the manual, the bathroom is often shared with the host family and the price of the breakfast is usually included in the room price.

Rice said he helped establish the Kansas Bed and Breakfast Association to promote the inns as well as general tourism in the state. The association, which is still in the organizational stage, will have its first meeting April 2.

Similar associations exist in Colorado and Vermont, where Rice worked with the University of Vermont before arriving at K-State in 1986.

"When I got to Kansas I found nothing in terms of organization," Rice said.

Betty Anderson, a local bed and breakfast owner, said she feels the association will be an improvement for the inns in Kansas.

"I think it's necessary that we have some type of standards," Anderson said.

While there were about a dozen bed and breakfast inns in the state when he arrived in 1986, Rice said there are 48 here today.

"There's a lot of interest," Rice said. "We hope to double that number in the next few years."

While they will never compare in economic impact with conventional lodging, in a small, rural community the bed and breakfast can provide otherwise unavailable lodging, increase the tax base, provide employment, and protect and maintain older homes and hotels, Rice said. He said promoting the inns also promotes the economic development of the state.

He said another important feature of the bed and breakfast is that tourists are able to meet Kansans in their homes.

"If you stay at a bed and breakfast, you're going to meet fantastic people," Rice said.

Rice said Kansas has a history of people passing through on the way to somewhere else, but the bed and breakfasts may help change that image.

"Kansas people are survivors," he said. "This represents a whole industry of hospitality, of people saying 'Hey, stop. Slow down.'"

The bed and breakfast inn serves "a very narrow niche of people," Rice said.

Those who do stay at the inns tend to be adventurous and flexible, Rice said.

"They're willing to laugh off minor inconveniences," he said.

Samurai

"Samurai" is a good film. Parts are comic and original, such as the young boy who wants to be a samurai but usually gets in the way, and the drunken, let-me-at-'em samurai who is as likely to kill his friends as his enemies.

One weakness is a stereotypic subplot with the classic peasant girl and the strangely handsome samurai.

and $4 at the show, and there was report of 12,000 tickets sold in 1989," Whetstone said. "The attendance figure was probably higher, because children 12 and under were admitted free, and the tickets were good all three days the festival was held."

Fehr said entertainment costs were big factors draining the budget, because there were four stages used for paid entertainers.

"We didn't want the festival to be just a parks and recreation event," he said. "We wanted corporate sponsors so the festival would be an organization of its own."

The City Park Arts and Crafts Fair

Finally, the soundtrack mixes beautifully authentic oriental music, dissonant and spooky to my ears, with goofy melodies from oboes and bassoons.

The black-and-white film is in Japanese with English subtitles.

The Union Program Council Kaleidoscope film is scheduled to be shown at 7 p.m. Wednesday in Forum Hall, 3:30 p.m. Thursday in the Little Theatre and 7 p.m. Thursday in Forum Hall.

will still take place on Sept. 21-23, and a committee is pursuing the idea of incorporating folklife displays during the fair, Fehr said.

"The Flinthearts Festival developed from this, and it will continue with no admission charge," Fehr said.

Whetstone said the festival association was formed to make the festival known outside Manhattan.

"The first year we had broad community volunteerism and involvement, and the second year the volunteerism was great, but the private sector wasn't as strong," he said.

"The community, as a whole, doesn't realize what the festival does for the economic development and promotion of the community," he said.

foreign crops because they compete in the world marketplace. The United States imports flour and fruit from South America during the winter.

"International news has become a local story," Seaton said.

Tyson addressed the recent trends in newspaper readership.

"In 1967 seventy-three percent of all adults read newspapers regularly," Tyson said. "Last year that number dropped to fifty-one percent."

Tyson said this drop in readership may be because editors are not giving people what they want, lifestyles have changed and people have given up on newspapers as a source of news.

"However, despite national trends, an overwhelming number of college students rely on newspapers and magazines as a major source of information," Tyson said.

Trescott said she is concerned with minorities in the newsroom. During the '70s there was more diversity in the newsroom, and that hasn't continued through to the '90s.

place team.

"We've got to go to Missouri and Kansas and regardless of (O-State's) schedule, they don't have to do that," Kruger said. "They are still in very good shape."

"I'm not going to worry about what this loss does to us," Hamilton said. "I don't have any crystal ball. Hell, you don't even know until the NCAA people decide."

signed the Big Eight's best streak shooter in Terry Brown. Brown, who led Northeastern Oklahoma A&M to the 1989 NJCAA title, was voted the tournament's most valuable player as a reserve last year.

Credentials like those have kept area junior colleges from being a well-kept secret in the Midwest in recent years. And have made it a lot harder for the likes of Kruger and Williams to keep some of those Jayhawk Conference standouts in the state.

"During the '70s, newspapers were responding to the race riots," Trescott said. "Many minorities that hadn't even considered reporting, were recruited to give stories a new perspective."

Investigative reporting, such as the Watergate stories, made reporting an almost glamorous profession in the '70s. Now the public thinks reporters are the people who go knock on the door of someone who has just lost a child and ask them how they feel, she said.

Marriott said he thought there would be a trend toward advocacy journalism. Reporters should be working more for what they believe in.

Biases exist even in the straight news story, Marriott said. Journalists shouldn't always depend on the authorities' point of view, and different points of view will give a different picture.

"When I write a story, I want to take a personal point of view," he said. "I want them to see what I've seen; I want them to feel what I felt."

The seminar was sponsored by the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

The students are going to be able to actually tend bar one night, said Dale Kelpin, a bartender at Last Chance and the classes' instructor. They will each spend 30 minutes dealing with customers and working with other people.

Most of the students enrolled in the class agreed that they were taking the class to become acutal bartenders and earn extra money.

business conducted by Senate and should be treated differently.

"He is elected, and whether you like it or not, he is mandated to appoint who he thinks is qualified," Giefer said. He compared the appointments to the refusal of Robert Bork to the United States Supreme Court. "Maybe we can be a little more grown up than the people in Washington. We don't want to stonewall and not get anything done."

Compromise between the senators is essential to the process, Giefer said.

"Put your two cents in, compromise a little, vote it through or vote it down, but drive on," he said.

Senate is going through a process of learning, said Ira Bolden, chief of staff for past student body president Laurian Cuffy.

"This is a part of growing — learning about people and real situations. The fundamental thing is that you have to find out about other people's opinions," Bolden said. "A lot of things come into play — that's life, that's politics."

Bolden urged the senators to communicate with each other before the meetings.

"Bicker behind closed doors if you have to, but do it constructively. Don't debate the person, debate the bill," he said. "You've got to communicate. That word is so powerful, but use it effectively."

"Even if you think your opinion is right, listen to other people," Bolden said.

Justin Sanders, graduate in physics and past senator, told the group they have a legacy of impressive work to follow. He stressed courtesy as an essential part of Senate.

"If (the public) sees you as a bunch of petty, bickering, snotty people, that's the impression they are going to take out of this room, so please be courteous," Sanders said.

He also commended the Senate, and said visitors at the meetings in the past have been impressed with the level of professionalism.

Personalities need to be protected during the meetings, said Nattan Rath, graduate in physics and past senator. He told the senators to show their disagreement, but not to let it interfere with the Senate's procedures.

Kern said the meeting was not about philosophies, but how to make things better for student government and the student body.

"We've got a long year ahead of us, and if we don't work together, it's going to be a long, unproductive year," he said.

Kern said he hopes the ideas discussed at the meeting will be reflected in Thursday night's Senate meeting.

value of research being too often measured quantitatively — by the number of books or articles published or by the amount of money obtained through grants.

Although it is possible to evaluate teaching quantitatively — through scores on student evaluations, numbers of students taught and numbers of hours spent grading papers and in the classroom — Bixler said both research and teaching should be evaluated qualitatively.

"The fact is, we count what we want to count," she said. "How we spend administrators' time — as well as how we spend our money — is an indication of our values."

Women do not need special help in playing the tenure-promotion game, Bixler said.

"Rather, what we are saying it that there is something wrong with the game," she said.

Wefald said the University has a real problem if just half of what Bixler said was true.

Report on rights sent to Congress

State Department criticizes crackdowns in China, Cuba

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Crackdowns in China and Cuba drew strong criticism from the State Department in its annual human rights report to Congress on Wednesday in contrast to praise for a remarkable opening of the political process in the Soviet Union.

The human rights situation on the West Bank and in Gaza, where Palestinian Arabs are in the 27th month of an uprising against Israeli control, was described as a source of deep concern.

Assistant Secretary Richard Schifter, the principal compiler of the 1,641-page document, contrasted suppression in China with giant human-rights advances in Eastern Europe.

He told a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee that the crackdown on pro-democracy forces in China last year put into reverse, in very short order, much of the significant movement toward a more open society which had taken place in China during the last 10 years.

There was no indication, however, that the Bush administration was about to harden its policy toward China, which several members of Congress have likened to kid-gloves treatment. Schifter said the United States must maintain ties to Beijing in order to bring about improvements.

In Cuba, meanwhile, the report said President Fidel Castro has taken or fabricated opportunities to harass, detain or imprison 50 human rights advocates while the Marxist government silenced many of its leading domestic critics.

The picture in the Soviet Union was brighter. Under President Mikhail S. Gorbachev, the report said, the past year witnessed a remarkable opening up of the political process and improvements in human rights practices.

Still, the report said, the Soviet Union has a considerable distance to go before it will meet the standards set forth in the Helsinki Final Act of 1975, a 35-nation pledge to foster human rights, in which Moscow joined.

Though the top leadership no longer fosters anti-Semitism and appears embarrassed by it, "there has been a sharp increase in popular expressions of anti-Semitic attitudes," the report said. "Jews have been increasingly concerned over the danger of violence."

Schifter, in presenting the worldwide findings, said the specter of totalitarianism is at long last disappearing from Europe. He added: "As of today, Albania is the only relic of the age of Hitler and Stalin left intact in Europe."

From beheadings and amputations in Saudi Arabia to student detentions in Liberia and to disappearances in El Salvador, the document catalogued man's inhumanity to man in virtually every conceivable way.

Pro-democracy demonstrators were gunned down in the area of Beijing's Tiananmen Square last June, and independent observers were cited as challenging the official toll of 20 executions as unrealistically low.

In Myanmar, formerly Burma, men forced to walk ahead of army troops in mine-infested fields were blown up.

In Iran, prisoners were flogged and suspended from the ceiling, according to eyewitnesses and human rights groups.

Israel, a democracy, came in for little criticism. But there was concern about the occupied West Bank and Gaza.

While the Israeli defense forces engaged in a severe crackdown, the report cited a significant increase in Palestinian violence against Israeli forces.

Moss charged in slaying

By Lori Antrim
Staff Reporter

John L. Moss, a suspect being held in connection with the Tuesday beating death of a student, was arraigned Wednesday in Riley County District Court.

Judge Paul Miller read the charges of second degree murder and robbery. Moss did not enter a plea on the second degree murder charge, and a not guilty plea was entered by the court for the misdemeanor charge of theft.

Moss first pleaded guilty to the charge of theft, but Miller explained that the court was assigning him a public defender. Miller said until Moss met with his attorney, it would be in his best interest to enter a not guilty plea. Moss agreed and the court entered the plea for him.

The body of Shane D. Harrison, a freshman in engineering, was found in the alley behind 816 N. Juliette a little after 8 a.m. Tuesday, said Riley County Police Lt. Rodney Jager of the Criminal Investigation Division.

Jager said no weapon was involved and there are no other suspects in the case. He said a motive for the slaying is not being released at this time.

Harrison was pronounced dead at the scene by County Coroner Rick Kaldor. He said Harrison was beaten severely, especially around and on the head.

A preliminary hearing in the case is set for Monday at 10:30 a.m. At that time, Moss is scheduled to enter a plea on the felony charge.

Moss's bond was set for $50,000 and will remain the same until Monday. Moss is being held in the Riley County Jail.

Harrison was the son of Frank and Carolyn Harrison and graduated from Wamego High School in 1989. He was an honor student majoring in computer engineering, and a Phi Kappa Tau pledge.

Officer Richard Kellogg escorts John L. Moss into the Riley County Courthouse Wednesday morning for his arraignment. Moss was charged with second degree murder and robbery in connection with the Tuesday morning beating death of Shane D. Harrison, a freshman in engineering.

Johnson to submit nominees

Revised list of Tribunal candidates to be considered by Student Senate

By Kirk Caraway
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate will again grapple with Student Body President Todd Johnson's appointments to Tribunal tonight at 7 p.m. in the Union Big Eight Room.

The revised list of candidates Johnson is submitting includes Tom Leikam, junior in journalism and mass communications, and Don Baker, junior in animal sciences and industry. Both candidates were not on last week's list.

"I feel confident this group will be approved by Senate," Johnson said.

Leikam was picked Monday to replace Johnny Gaffney, sophomore in pre-law, who withdrew his name from consideration after last week's controversy. Leikam, who served as chief justice of Marlatt Hall's Judicial Board, will represent the residence halls if approved by Senate.

Angela Stinchcomb, who was originally picked to represent the residence halls, was then moved to represent Interfraternity and Panhellenic councils. However by Wednesday, IFC expressed reservations to Johnson about Stinchcomb being their representative.

"IFC was upset someone would be representing them without living in a greek house," Johnson said.

Stinchcomb is a new initiate in Kappa Alpha Theta sorority, but currently lives in Goodnow Hall.

IFC then recommended Baker be chosen to represent them on Tribunal. Stinchcomb was then moved to an at-large position and Tim Browder, senior in construction science, was removed from the list by Johnson.

Royalties not needed in K-State promotions

By Lori Stauffer
Collegian Reporter

In a television commercial, highlights from the K-State football and basketball seasons flash across the screen while a Led Zeppelin song plays in the background, telling viewers about a "Stairway to Heaven."

Chris Peterson, assistant athletic director for marketing and sales, said the commercial is image enhancement for the athletic program and the University in general.

The key is to make a positive statement about the University, Peterson said.

"Athletically for the last five or six years, we have sat back and let people kick sand in our face," he said. "The song is the same, but the tune has changed since Athletic Director Steve Miller has taken the reins."

Peterson said his job is to build on that change when he develops the commercials.

He has put together six video spots for television commercials in the last 16 months. The first spot featured "Talkin' Bout a Revolution" by Tracy Chapman. Peterson said it proved to be a successful marketing tool for the University.

"Revolution" was very popular throughout the state," Peterson said.

"Revolution" was followed by a spot using "What a Wonderful World" by Louis Armstrong. Two other commercials using versions of the song "Good Thing" by the Fine Young Cannibals were used to promote football season tickets, he said.

A spot using Berlin's "Take My Breath Away" and "Stairway to Heaven" hit the airwaves this winter.

The University does not pay for the right to use the songs because the commercials are not backed by the original song, Peterson said.

"They sound similar, but are not the original song," he said.

Peterson said he has previously used a group from New Jersey called the Hi-Tops to re-record some songs.

A spokesperson from the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers said a royalty would not need to be paid if the television stations that air the commercial have ASCAP licenses.
